HEART-DIVISIONS OPENED

To the Reader.

Hether the fiery tryall of contention, or of persecution be greater, is hard to determine; God hath wrought to free us from the one, we have brought upon our selues the other. Every man is angry that others are not of his minde; we have been so divided, that it is the infinite mercy of God that our enemies have not come in at our breaches, and divided all among themselves, before this time. Were our divisions onely betwenee the good and bad, they were not so grievous. Chrysostome sayes, It is better to be hated for Christ, then to be beloved for him. How much better then is it to be hated for Christ, then to be beloved for sinne? The reason he gives of that strange assertion of his, is, If thou best loved for God, it is an honour to thee, and thou art a debtour for that honour; If thou best hated for him, God is a debtour to thee, he owes honour to thee, for so he is pleased to be to his poore servants. But our divisions have been and still are between good men, even Gods Diamonds do cut one another; good men cause afflictions to good men; every man is plotting, working, winding for himselfe. Every man strives like Apelles and Protogenes who shall draw the subtilest line to attain his owne ends, but few strive who shall draw the straightest, who shall in the most direct course work himselfe and all his wayes to God and publique Good. Who can meddle.
die with this fire that is kindled among us, and not burn his fingers? A mans good affections happily may be approved, but his prudence will be questioned. But what I finde Luther writes in an Epiftle to his friend Nicolas Gerbelius in the like case, shall satisfy me, Cupio ego inveniri Christi & Ecclefiæ fuae fidelis, si prudens esse non potuerim minister: I desire howsoever to be a faithful Minister of Christ and his Church, if I cannot be a prudent one. The standing in the gap is more dangerous and troublesome then the getting behinde the hedge, there you may be more secure, and under the winde, but it is best to be there where God looks for a man. That which Pelopidas said to his wife taking her leave of him as he was going out of his house to the Warres, is a speech worthy of all men in publique place: She comes weeping to him, and prayes him to look well to himselfe; he answers her, My good wife, it is for private soldiery to be careful of themselves, not for those in publique place, they must have an eye to save other men lives. It may be when you are going about a work that hath hazard and trouble in it, your wives or some friends of yours will with great affection desire you, beseech you, to have a care of your selves, that you bring not your selves into trouble or danger, oh take heed of that, rather never meddle, let others doe that work if they will; you should answer, It is for private men to take care of themselves, but men in publique places are called to look to the publique, that it suffers not through their neglect.
Some come into the gap, not to make it up, but to keep it open, yea to make it wider; the Lord deliver me from such a spirit: God knows I had rather die, then be
To the Reader.

A cause of so great an evil. What this endeavour of mine may work in mens hearts, God knowes. If it meet with a son of peace, I hope it will speake peace, it will establish peace in such a heart: if with a son of strife it may worke ad modum recipientis. That which is intendent to be an Irenicum, may prove to be a Polemicum, a bone of contention.

Those things which God himselfe ordaines for union (the Sacraments) are by mans corruption made the occasion of the greatest contention in the Christian world. No marvell then that what comes from mans sincerest intentions and best endevours be turned quite crosse.

Like enough these leaves may meet with some boisterous Reader, that may beat them one against another, that may pry and picke to finde that in them which is not, looking thorough the contradictions of his owne spirit he may think he sees the like here. Let the lines be never so straight, yet he will wrest and pul them what he can to make them lye crosse. I am so far from being sollicitous that they are so indeed, that the speciall thing I desire of thee is the laying one thing to another, the comparing one thing with another. Remember what the subject is, Divisions, Differences. I have in it to deale with various spirits, opinions, wayes: remember the scope is to seeke the composing of them what I can. If you see me now neare to the one side, and by and by neare to the other, which yet are very wide from one another, be not rash to judge, that I am off my center; reade on, and see what the issue may come to.

help of the shooe of the preparation of the Gospel of peace, I doe not finde my feet cut.

Peace is pretious to me, I feele the sweetnesse of it; I am willing to do what I can to honour it. The publique jarres, contentions, disturbances abroad in Church and Common-wealth are very grievous. They say there are in the world such things in Families also. I have brought here some water: if my line had been longer, my bucket had beene fuller. You have here what I delivered: some things are added, especially quotations of Authors and Histories. When they grow to be many I thinke them fitter for the Preffe then the Pulpit. I was the more willing these things should come forth to publique view, because otherwise what other men apprehended to be my minde, would be put into their owne words, and so rendred in an evill appearance. But will Printing help? The boldnesse of this age is such, as not onely to make a mans words found otherwise then when they came from him, and so traduce him; but confidently to averre that there are such things written in such Bookes, of such men, which never yet came into their thoughts, much lesse into their pen. With what boldnesse hath it been said and printed againe and againe, that I in that Book entituled, The glorious name of God, The Lord of Hofts, did call the Earle of Essex the Lord of Hofts. Surely the sight of these men is extramittendo, not intramittendo, they send forth species of their owne dyed with the evill of their hearts, and then they say they finde them in such a book. No man can finde that name given by me to him. I indeed endeavoured to encourage him in his worke, because the Lord had made him the Lord of our Hofts, which is no more then the Lord of our our Armies. The utmost that ever was said or writ comes but to this, that God had put a name upon him that came neare to his, but never mentioned without some difference from it. An abuse in this kinde, though not altogether so high, I have had from the Anti-Apologist; he quotes many places in my Lectures upon Hosea, he sets downe the pages, wherein he sayes, I have contrary to what is in the Apology preached for that way you call Independent. Would any man but thinke, when he sees the Booke named in Print, the Lecture, the very page mentioned, but that the thing is true, it is to be found there? But to this day it hath never come to my eares that ever any man hath found such things there but himselfe. Are those the places? Let moderate and quiet spirited men looke into them, and they shall finde nothing there but what the generality of Presbyteriall Brethren, yea I thinke I may say every one, who is not either Prelaticall or very violent, will acknowledge to bee truth, and if so, I am free. But we shall have another time for this. At this time I would gladly that this Treatife might meet with no spirit exasperated, but in calmnesse and quietnesse, let what is here be examined. That God that can create the fruit of the lips to be peace, can make the fruit of the pen to be so. My aymes are peace, which I shall never cease endeavouring and praying for, who am

HEART-DIVISIONS
The Evill of our Times.

HOSEA 10. 2.
Their Heart is divided, now shall they be found faulty.

CHAP. I.
The Text opened, and suitableness of it to our Times, shewed.

O marvail though Israel be charged, ver. 1. to be an empty vine, seeing their heart is divided. Heart-division will cause emptiness of good, both in mens spirits, and in Church and State. The least dividing of the heart, in any one part from another, if it be but by the prick of a pin, is deadly; a great gash in the head is curable. There may be much difference in mens opinions without any great hurt, if this difference gets not to the heart; but if once it gets in there, the danger is great; Now shall they be found faulty. Now shall they be guilty; or as some, Nunc delinquent, Now they will offend; as if Heart-division contracted the greatest guilt, and by it men were the greatest Delinquents of any. The word signifies also to perish, to be made desolate, fo Aries Montanus, Desolabuntur. Heart-division is a desolating sinne, by the judgment of God upon them for it, they shall be convinced in their own consciences, and in the sight of all men, that they were guilty; that by such a sin as this, they had bound themselves over to the justice of God, & those desolating evils that came upon them, were were the righteous judgments of God upon them for those divisions that were amongst them. Men will not be convinced of their sin, till God's judgement is upon them for it; and then their consciences will, and others shall see that God is righteous, and they are vile and full of sin full before him, even in such things that before they pleaded for, or at least could not be brought to own their own guiltiness in. When thunder and rain came upon the men of Israel in their wheat Harvest, and they were afraid they should dye, 1 Sam. 12. 18, 19. then they could say, We have added unto all our sins this evil to ask us a King.

The Lord convince us of, and humble us for the sinfulness of our divisions by his word, that desolating judgments be not upon us to convince and humble us.

Their heart is divided.

This Heart-division is either from God, or from one another.

Their heart is divided between God and their Idols; They would not cast off the worship of God wholly, that was too much; they loved their Idols, but they must not have all: to divide between God and them they thought was faire. Their hearts were also divided one from another; and just it is with God, that those who divide from him, should divide one from another. 2 King. 15. you may see what wofull divisions there were amongst them, King against people, and people against King, Civill Wars. Their King comes upon one of their owne Towns, and smites it, and rips up all the women that were with Child in it, and all because they opened not to him. O the rage and cruelty of men of proud spirits, when they get power into their hands! for then their pride swells, being blown up with the flatteries of such as are about them: As if they were such gods upon earth, as they might doe whatsoever they pleased, and the lives, estates, liberties, comforts of all must lie under their feet, and must submit to their lusts and humours. You shall find further in the whole Chapter, there was nothing but conspiring, mischieving, and murdering one another. In their Church State there was nothing but factions and rents one from another; some were for the
the true worship, some for the false. And amongst the false worshippers there were divisions too: Some were for the calves that Jeroboam set up at Dan and Bethel; some were for Baal: great contention there was between these. You know the story of Jehu an Idolater, yet destroying the worshippers of Baal and his Idols.

The Jews of old understood this Text of these heart-divisions amongst themselves, as well as of their divisions from God, which appears by a notable tradition of theirs; St. Jerome in his Comment upon these words, relates: whereas (says he) the Scripture, 2 Kings 17. tells us, that Hoshea was the last King of Israel, and in his time Israel was carryed captive; yet vers. 2. It is said, He did not evill in the sight of the Lord, as the Kings of Israel that were before him. Now the Jews put this Question, Why was not Israel carryed captive with their King, when they had the worst King, but rather when things seemed to goe something better then before? God yet chooses this time.

The Answer they give, is, Because in former times the people might pretend, they could not tell how to help what they did amisse in the matter of Worship; Indeed they worshipped the Calves, but they were forced to it by the tyranny of their Kings; it should be the losse of all they had if they did not: but (say they) in the days of Hoshea there was more liberty given then before. Now those who would, might goe up to Jerusalem to worship, and that they say is the reason of that expression; that Hoshea did not evill as other Kings had done; but when they came to have more liberty, they fell to wrangling amongst themselves, (which is an usuall concomitant of liberty) now their division rose high, some would go up to Jerusalem to worship, others would not; those that went up, cried out of those who went not; and those who went not, vilified those who went. Now their hearts are thus divided, now shall they be found guilty. The desolating judgment must now come. This is the time for their captivity. Now he gives them up to the Enemy. God was exceedingly provoked with their contentions one against another at this time. What? (saies God) when I was in some way of favour towards them, when I took off (in great part) part) the yoke of bondage that was upon them, that fore oppression that was before, none of them (a while since) dared go to Jerusalem to worship, and now their Governours are more moderate, their oppressing Courts are downe, there is more liberty in the Land for my true worship, and do they now fall out, contemn, divide, wrangle one with another? let them goe into captivity, let the enemy come in upon them, my soule takes no delight in such a crooked perverse Generation as this is.

Our condition seems to parallel with theirs very much, we lately were under sore and cruell bondage, nothing was more dangerous then the worshipping God in his own way, we were under hard Task-masters, oppressing, undoing Courts; The Lord hath in a great measure delivered us, it is the unthankfulness, the sinfull distemper of mens spirits that makes them say, what is done? it is as ill with us as ever it was; No, we have much eafe, such liberties, as were our fore-fathers raised out of their graves to see, they would admire God's goodness, and bless him with meltlings of heart; but we spend that strength in siding, wrangling, contending, quarrelling, vexing, opposing one another, that we should spend in magnifying, blessing and praising the Name of God for that mercy we enjoy. We are a divided people, whose hearts are divided, and heads too, and hands too; peace and unity seems to be flown from us, and a spirit of contention and division is come upon us: King & Subjects are divided, Parl. is divided, Assembly is divided, Armies are divided, Church is divided, & State is divided, City is divided, Country is divided, Towns are divided, Families divided, godly people are divided, Minister's almost every where are divided; yea, and what heart almost is there at this time but is divided in it self? the thoughts, the counsels, contrivances, endeavours, ways of men, almost of all men, how are they divided? O blessed Saviour! are these the times thou speakest of, wherein five should be in one house divided, three against two, and two against three; the father against the son, and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother? Oh woe to us! wee find it so amongst us, and yet there is found no healing; we are broken, and there is no binding up: It is with us as it was with Ezekiel Ezek. 2. 6. Briars and thorns are with us, and we dwell among Scorpions. O Lord, what is this thy curse at this time upon England? Bryers and thornes shall it bring forth: We are rending and tearing, and devouing one another, while the adversary stands before us ready to devour us: Ephraim is against Manasseh, and Manasseh against Ephraim. A fire is come out from Abimilech, and devoures the men of Sechem; and fire comes from the men of Sechem, and devoures Abimilech; yea, there is a fire kindled in our owne bowels, it rises from our selves. Ezek. 19. 14. Fire is gone out of a rod of her branches, which hath devoured her fruit, so that she hath no strong rod to be a Scepter to rule, this is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation. This is amongst us at this day, and how long it shall continue, God onely knows.

What this people were in their divided condition, that we are; and what does this threaten, but that we should be as they a while after this were? namely, a people given up to the rage and fury of the Enemy, which the Lord forbid.

There is a great out-cry of our divisions, and while we cry out against them, we still encrese them; we are angry with men rather, because they are divided from our selves, then because they are divided from the truth; we are angry because every man is not of our own mind, & does not as we do. There was a great deal of doe in Luthers time about the seamless coat of Christ. Granvillian the Emperours Deputy in a Speech he made to the Citizens of Wormes, befeeches them for the death of Christ, and for all loves, that they would amend our Lords coate, which is rent and torn on every side. When Luther laboured to bring Reformation to the Rule, they bad him take heed that he did not rend the seamless coat of Christ; and because they talked so much of the tunica inconfutilis, they were called the Inconfutiliste, the seamlesse men: And what a firre hath there been in out-cryes against men that would not yeeld to every thing that was enjoyned? O they rent the seamlesse Coat of Christ. I remember Musculus in a Traffe he hath De Schismate, hath a witty and pious note upon this, The Souldiers ( faith he ) would not divide the seamlesse coat of Christ; but what made them to be so carefull of it? was it out of respect to Christ, that they were so unwilling it should be divided?

Sleid. Com. lib. 12.
divided? No, but out of respect to their owne advantage, every one hoping it might fall to his share, therefore say they, Let us cast lots for it; so, faith he, men would not have Christ's coat divided, they would have no division in the Church; but what do they aime at? their own advantage, that they might enjoy quietly their owne ease, honour, and means, that they might have none to contradict them, but that the streame may run smoothly and wholly with them, what a fine brave thing were this? And because they see they cannot doe this while their ways are looked into and crossed, therefore they make such an outcry against the dividing the seamlesse coat of Christ.

But certainly, till our hearts be otherwise then yet they are, all our out-cries will not serve our ends, the filling our divisions. Did we less divide between God and our own ends, our own ways, we should not divide so much one from another. Wherefore let us first turn our thoughts to consider a little of this division between God and other things, and the evil of it.

CHAP. II.
The evil of dividing between God and any thing else.

This people would give God something, and their idols something, and so think to please both, 2 King, 7. 33. They feared the Lord, and served their Idols. Thus Judah in the days of Josiah, Zeph. 1. 5. Swear by the Lord, and by Malcham; Swearing is a part of God's worship, therefore no humane instituted Religious ceremony ought to be joyned with it, no more then with the Sacrament, or any other divine worship, no creature should share in it, but they joyned Malcham, that is their King. The worship and service proper to God hath been too much divided between God and the Kings of the Earth; but here it's probable is meant their Idol, to which they gave a Kingly power over them, their Idol Moloch had his name from hence.

I have read of Redwald King of the East Saxons, the first Prince of his Nation that was baptized, in the same place worshipped Christ, and set up an Altar to worship his Idols. Many mens mens spirits lye like that Haven, Acts 26. 12, towards the Southwest and Northwest, two opposite points: Surely their spirits must needs be very winding and crooked which lye towards such opposites.

This dividing with God is very wicked; what communion hath God with Belial? How can you partake of the Table of the Lord, and the Table of Devills? 1 Cor. 10. 21. And lest they should think it a light thing thus to divide with God, hee adds, ver. 22. Do we provoke the Lord to jealouzie? are we stronger then he? It is a great provoking of God, and a fighting against him, thus to divide in his worship. To think that God should accept of such a dividing, is to make him cruel, like that Harlot, 1 King. 3. 26, who was content to have the child divided. Let it be neither mine nor thine, but let it be divided. Gods worship is as deare to him as any child can be to the most tender-hearted mother in the world. When Darius would have divided with Alexander, No, sayes Alexander, there can be but one Sun in the Firmament. If we will be dividing with God, he will cast off all. 2 King. 17. 33. it is said, they feared the Lord, and served their Idols; but ver. 34. it is said, they did not feare God, God accounted a divided feare no feare at all. Verse 16. it is said, They left all the Commandments of the Lord their God, and made them molten Images. If they give any part of Gods honour to molten Images, he acknowledges no honour at all given to him, he accounts all his Commandments to be left. So Jer. 32. 23. They have done nothing of all that thou commandedst them to doe: and ver. 30. The children of Israel and the children of Judah have onely done evil before me.

God is infinite, and hath all excellency in him, therefore he must have the whole heart; Idols doe not challenge so much, because they have not an univerfall excellency, a piece of worship is enough for them; our hearts, estates, liberties, all we have, are more Gods then our owne. Cyrus tooke Babylon by dividing the River: The Devill soon surprizes us, if he can but divide our hearts.

The reason why heathen Rome rejected Christ from being of the number of their gods, when such a thing was tended to their Senate, was, Because ( say they ) if we receive him to be a God,
Heart-divisions

God, he will suffer none of our other gods; if we take in any other new god, we may yet retain still our old ones; but if we take this Jesus, all our old ones must be abandoned. Many at this day reject Christ upon this ground.

The Romanists since think they can take in Christ for a God, and yet divide between him and other gods; their Religion is made up of divisions between God and their graven Images; between Christ the Mediator, and Saints and Angels; between the Word, and their own Traditions; between Divine Institutions, and Humane Inventions.

1 King. 18. 21. Why halt ye between two opinions? We must not be voluntary Cripples to halt between two. Why are you dismembered in your hearts and your opinions? For Josephus in his History mentioning that place. That is observable, when the Prophet put that question to them, the Text faith, The people held their peace, their mouths were stopped, they had not a word to say for themselves. If any thing be pretended for this dividing, it is that trouble may be prevented: exactness in Religion, through Reformation, giving up our selves wholly to God and his truth, hath a shew of bringing much trouble with it. Hence men winde and shift about, and doe what they doe by halves.

It was a notable speech of Calvin to those who were offended with troubles they met with in the work of Reformation, If wee could be content with halfe a Christ, (sayes he) our worke would more easily goe on, we could soone bring about what wee would have, we should not meet with so much opposition, but nothing but a whole Christ will serve our turne.

But it is necessary that all things be reformed at once?

No: Affirmative Precepts doe not binde to all times, but Negative doe; therefore it is necessary at all times, that there be no mixture of evil with any good we doe, that our Mediocrity be not Medium participationis, but Medium abnegationis, between two extremes, which are evil, but not partaking of any evil; no good thing is moderated by mixture of evil, but by removing from it something that is evil, that hath already mingled it selfe with it.

But must God have all our hearts, so as we may not let them out at all to any thing else?
If we let out our hearts to any thing but in subordination to God, then we divide between God and that thing sinfully; but though we do let out our affections to other things, yet if it be in subordination to God, so farre as God is in those things, and we may be led nearer to God by them; this is no dividing between God and other things, but an uniting all in God, and enjoying God in all. The Saints are instructed in this mystery of godlineesse, they know how to give God the whole heart, and yet to enjoy the comforts of wives and children, and estates, and callings, as much as any in the world; they have that heavenly skil to unite all in God, and enjoy God in all, God is all in all unto them in their enjoyments of all good whatsoever; but if our hearts be let out to any thing otherwise then thus, they go a whoring from God, and will certainly vanish in their own folly. This is contrary to that singleneffe, to that oneness of heart promised as a blessing of the Gospel. Many of you complain of barrenneffe, here is the reason your hearts are divided; were the stream of your hearts wholly after God, it would runne strongly, and bear down opposition before it, you would be fruitfull in all the ways of holinesse.

How fruitful and gloriously useful would men in publike place be, if their hearts were single and one for God; did they only care to honour God in their duty, and leave the care of protection of, and provision for themselves and state to God? Let not mens hearts be cut, be divided with their cares and fears about consequences and successes; their wisdom should be how to work all about for God, not how handomely to contrive that God may have part, and themselves part. The more fully we give up our selves, our ends, designes to God, the more securely may we sit under Gods protection, care, and blessing. Many of the good Kings of Judah had their hearts for God, but yet they let the high Places stand; their politick wisdom divided their hearts between God, and their fears of disturbance in the State; If they should raise their Reformation so high, by this their division, their hearts lay flat, the worke was neglected. But 2 Chron. 17. 6. Jehoshaphats heart was lift up in the ways of the Lord, he tooke away the high places and groves, he sought to the Lord God of his father, and went.
Heart-divisions

When they divided from God, then they divided from his people, they would not joyn with his people in the way of his worship, only such as set their hearts to seek the Lord God of Israel, went to Jerusalem to sacrifice to the Lord God of their fathers, 2 Chr. 11. 16. only those whose hearts the Lord touched, but others for their own carnall ends would not joyn with them, they saw trouble attended that way; and having divided themselves from God & his people, it was God's curse upon them that they should be divided one from another; if you be divided from the truth, what can hold you together? Truth is a single, simple, plain thing, but error is various, and ensnars it self with infinite contradictions: If people goe out of the plaine path of truth, they wander up and down God knows whither, intangling themselves in briers and thornes, so as they cannot extricate themselves: As those ten Tribes which at first divided from Judah only in their subjection to the house of David, and in their worship at Jerusalem, but after they denied all Scripture but only the 5. books of
of Moses: They were exceedingly given, and generally added unto sorcery, magick, and witch-craft, in which they grew more and more notorious till Christ's time. This is intimated in that blasphemy of the Jewes against our Saviour, Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a Devil, taxing him with the practice of that people, who commonly being Witches, had familiar spirits attending on them, for otherwise they knew he was no Samaritan, but a Galilean of Nazareth: They were also exceedingly divided amongst themselves. Epiphanius recites four several sects of them, the Offens, Sebueans, Gorthenians, and Positbeans; Truth is the bond that keeps to unity, but error is wilde, you know not where to find it, nor your selves if you give way to it: Our present times will be a testimony of this to all future generations. The wild and unruly divisions of our times is to be the subject of the future discourse. I am not ignorant nor sensible of the difficulty, the trouble, the danger there is in medling with such a subject at such a time as this. He that meddles with the divisions of the times, may expect to be divided himself, to have his name, his repute, to be cut asunder and thrown this way and that way: It is an unthankfull work to meddle with a divided people; a man may with as much safety put his hand into a nest of Hornets. A learned man being once asked why he did not write his judgment about the controversy of his time, answered, To what purpose? it would not help the cause, but much hazard him that should meddle. That which one once said to Luther, when he was about interesting himself in seeking Reformation, sounded in my ears, when I first thought of having to do with this Argument, O Luther, rather get you into your Cell, and say, Lord have mercy upon us.

It is a great part of the skill of a Minister to divide the word aright; but this skill of his will be put to it, when he comes to divide the word amongst a divided people, to give every part its portion. I should never have ventured to have chosen a Text on purpose for such an argument; but seeing Providence hath brought it so fully into my way, I shall now venture upon it, with my heart cast and fixed upon that promise, Pro. 11. 3. The uprightness of the upright shall guide him.
I shall cast what I intend into this mould:
1. The causes of our Divisions.
2. The evill of them.
3. Cautions about them, that we may not make an ill use of them.
4. Remedies or cures of them.

The causes of our Divisions.

The principal cause from without, is the Devil, he seeks to keep his own kingdom free from divisions, but seeks nothing more then to cause divisions in the Kingdom of Christ. The Mahumetans, who worship a cursed impostor: The Pagans, who worship the Sun, Moon, and Stars: The Egyptians, who worship Onions, Leeks, Cats and Dogs, never had such divisions amongst them as the worshippers of Jesus Christ have had, and have at this day amongst themselves; for all the former are the Devils kingdom, which he seeks to keep at peace; but he is that envious one who sows the seeds of division in the Kingdom of Christ; hence those who foment divisions amongst Christians are called Devils, 1 Tim. 3. 11. The wives of Deacons must not be slanderers: The word may be translated Devils: women are most liable to the Devils temptations this way, because they are weak, and are in danger to run away with sudden apprehensions without due examination; and what can foment division more then slandering, so far as any, especially in the Church, hath a hand in causing or fomenting division, so farre as he is a Devil in Scripture-language, the part of the Devil is acted by them. I remember Cajetan hath a note upon that place in the Gospel, where the devils being cast out of the man, who had a legion in him, prayed Christ that they might not goe out of that region; why would they not go out of that region? says Cajetan; He gives this answer, The Devils have certain places to which they divide their work, such Devils to such a place for such a service, and such to another for another service; now these Devils were loath to be displaced of their region, though they were cast out of the man, having further work to do in that place:
place: If this be so, surely the Devils that are appointed to cause and foment divisions and dissensions above all regions, love to be in the region of Churches; for nowhere do divisions such hurt as there, and at this time especially; for now the Devils see they cannot prevail to get men to their old superstitious vanities; but some reformation there will be, they now seek to mingle a perverse spirit of division amongst men, hoping they shall prevail here, though they could not hold their own in the former. God put enmity between Satan and the Saints, but it is the Devil that puts enmity between Saints and Saints. When we hear fearful thundering, and see terrible storms and tempests, many people say, that ill spirits are abroad; surely these blustering storms of contention are raised and continued from evil spirits: But the truth is, all the Devils in hell could do us no great hurt in dividing us from God or from one another, were it not for the corruption of our own hearts: Wherefore as the Lord says to Israel, Perditio tua ex te, thy destruction is from thy self: So may we now say of England, Divisio tua ex te, thy division is from thy selfe.

The causes of our divisions from our selves, may be referred to three heads.

1. Dividing principles; sometimes our divisions come down from our heads to our hearts.

2. Dividing distempers, sometimes they go up from our hearts to our heads.

3. Dividing practices, and these come from head and heart, they foment and encrease both.

We will begin with dividing principles: Except some care be taken of the head, it will be in vain to meddle with the heart, to cry out against our heart-distempers; the chief cause of many of our divisions lies here: It is to little purpose, to purge or apply any medicine to the lower parts, when the disease comes from distillations from the head.

CHAP.
CHAP. IV.

Dividing Principles.

The first,

There can be no agreement without Uniformity.

1. Dividing Principle.

This Principle hath a long time caused much division in the Church. The right understanding wherein the weakness and falseness of it lies, will help much to Peace, to joyn us sweetly together.

In the substantials of worship, Unity is necessary; there all are bound to go by the same rule, and to do to the uttermost they are able, the same thing.

But the circumstantial of worship have a two-fold consideration: They are either such, as though but circumstances to some other worship, yet have also in themselves some divine worship, some spiritual efficacy, something in them to commend our service unto God, or to cause some presence of God with us, or to work us nearer to God, by an efficacy beyond what they have in them of their own natures. As for instance, Time is a circumstance, but the Lords day hath a worship in it commending our service to God, and an efficacy to bring God to us, and raise us to God: this not from any natural or civil, but from Gods institution. Now in such circumstances as these, there ought to be uniformity; for these have institutions for their rule, and are not at mans liberty to be altered as he thinks best in prudence; But there are other circumstances which are only natural or civil, subservient to worship in a natural or civil way; They are conversant about worship, but have nothing of worship in them, but are meerely natural or civil helps to it. When we worship God, we do something as men as well as worshippers; hence we have need of some natural or civil helps. As for instance, when we meet to worship God, we being men as well as Christians, must have a conveniency of place, to keep us from the weather, ther, to know whether to resort; and of time to know who.

There must be order: Many cannot speak at once to salvation; modest and grave carriage is required of us, as a society of men, meeting about matters of weight. In these circumstances, and other of the like nature, there is no worship at all, there is no spiritual efficacie, there are only natural or civil helps to us, while we are worshipping; therefore for these circumstances, humane prudence is sufficient to order them.

The right understanding of this takes away a great prejudice that many have against such as desire to keep to Divine Institutions, not only in Substantialls, but in the Circumstantialls of worship; they thinke it an unreasonable thing, that divine Institution should be required for every circumstance in worship; this hath bred a great quarrel in the church: and well may it be thought unreasonable, if we required Institutions for circumstances in worship, which are but natural or civil helps, and have no worship at all in them, for that indeed were endless, and a meer vanity. Certainly Institutions are to be required only in things that are raised beyond what is in them naturally, in tending my respects to God by them, or expecting to draw my heart nearer to God, or God nearer to me in the use of them. The contention about Uniformity is much increased for want of a right understanding of this difference in the circumstantialls of worship; did we understand one another in this, we might soon have Peace as concerning this thing.

In these latter sorts of circumstances we must also distinguish. There are some that must of necessity be determined, as time and place; it is therefore necessary, there should be an uniformity in these, in all the members of every societty respectively, that they agree to meet in the same place, at the same time, natural necessity requires this: but natural necessity requires not the binding of several Churches to Uniformity in things of this kind. The urging Uniformity beyond the rule in such things, hath in all ages caused wofull divisions in the Church. Eusebius tells of Victor, Bishop of Rome, about two hundred years after Christ, broke off communion.
munion from all the Churches of Asia, for not keeping Easter the same time he did. The controversy was not about Easter, but only about uniformity in the time. Never hath there been greater breaches of unity in the Church, then by violent urging Uniformity.

But further; there are other natural civil circumstances, which need not at all be determined; though there be a liberty and variety in them, yet order and edification is not hereby hindered. As for instance, in hearing the word, one stands, as Constantine was wont constantly to do; another sits; one is uncovered, another is covered; one hath one kind of garment, another, another; yet no rules of modesty or gravity are broken. Now if any power should violently urge uniformity in such like circumstances, and not leave them as Christ hath done, here they make the necessity of uniformity a dividing principle, upon these four grounds.

1. This is a straitning mens natural liberties, without satisfying their reason.

2. This hath been the in-let to almost all superstitions in the Church; First the plea hath been for decency and order, then there hath been stamped a humane institution to raise things higher.

3. The urging such things, when there is no reason seen in the nature of them; why this rather then that, makes men fear there is some religious respect put upon them already.

4. Here is a stretching the power of Authority beyond the limits of it, which Man naturally is very impatient of, not knowing how far it may yet further be extended. As for the practice of Church-Governors, or civil going beyond their bounds, we shall speak to in the third Head.

I have read of Solyman the great Turk, when he was advised by a Mufhtry to compell those of divers Religions in his Dominions to Mahumetisme; looking out of his window into his Garden, where there was great variety of flowers and herbs, said, "As the variety of flowers and herbs seeme very delightfull, so the diversity of Religions in my Kingdome is rather usefull then hurtfulsome, so it be those who profess them live peaceably. I am not of his mind for the variety of several Religions, of which further by and by; yet certainly in the the variety of the practices of Brethren in such things as wee are speaking of, tuned with brotherly love one towards another, there will be a sweet harmony, when violent urging Uniformity in such things will cause a harsh discord in the Churches.

When the fore-named Victor of Rome, with those who joyned with him, caused wofull divisions in the Church by standing so much upon uniformity, urging there could be no Peace without it, by it they brake the peace of the Church. Irenæus and others in the same time pleaded for the peace of the Church, to be procured by yeelding to difference of practice in such things, in the name of all the brethren in France under his charge, he writes to Victor, and those who joyned with him, and tells them of the variety of practices of divers Brethren in times before them, which was very neare the Apostles times, who yet were at unity one with another. They who were Bishops (says he) before Soter, of that Sea which now thou governest, as Anicetus, Pius, Higinus, Telephorus, Xistus, were at unity with them of other Churches, although their observations were various, and Polycarpus being at Rome in the time of Anicetus, varied in divers things from him. Although Polycarpus had (says he) what he did from John the Disciple of our Lord, with whom he conversed, yet would he not perswade Anicetus to the same things, but left him to the way of his owne Church, and they communicted lovingly one with another, and parted in a brotherly way. Cannot men walke peaceably in a broad way, though they do not tread just in one anothers stepe? What though there be some distance in their walke, one towards one side, the other towards the other side of the way; must they needs fall out, because they are not in the same path, when the way is broad enough? Indeed if they went over a narrow bridg, they must not take that liberty to go abredth; if they keep not close to one anothers stepe, if they step at a distance, they may fall into the River. Thus in matters of divine worship, we must look to it, that we walk exactly in the same stepe; if there we presume to take liberty, wee may soone fall; but in circumstances of an inferiour nature, there may be difference without division. We must not here take upon upon us to be wiser than Christ. Melanthon in an Epistle to some Brethren of differing minds (cited by Germon Bucerus) persuades to unity thus: Seeing (faith he) we agree in the principal Articles of Faith, let us embrace one another with mutual love, the dissimilitude and variety of Rights and Ceremonies, (I will add, saies Bucerus) and of Ecclesiastical Government, ought not to disjoin our minds.

Cum de praecipuis articulis doctrina Christiana inter nos conuersus, compleam nos mutuo amore, neq; dissimilias & varias ritus & ceremoniarum, addam ego & politia Ecclesiastica, disjungere debeo mentes regnas.

CHAP. V.

The second dividing Principle: All Religions are to be tolerated.

This is a divider indeed. There is a great outcry of this but what is the scope of it? it is to exasperate mens spirits against the toleration of any thing. Some think there must needs be a necessary dependance between tolerating some things conceived errors, and tolerating all things; and if it were not for the fear of the one, there would not be such ado about the other. But I hope I shall clearly shew there is no such dependence; but as this is a dividing principle, that all things should be tolerated, so the other is as truly dividing and false, that nothing should be tolerated.

There is nothing makes more stirre amongst us at this day, then this principle of absolute liberty in matters of Religion. Conscience pricess me to speak what I shall find to be the mind of God in this thing: The wantonness of mens spirits, their extream boldnesse about the matters of God, and Christ, is such, as should cause our hearts to tremble; such horrid blasphemous things are amongst us, owned and professed with so much impudence, and their practice strengthened by this Principle, That there is to be an absolute liberty in the things of Religion, that our duty to God, our love to, and care of the preservation of Religion, calls us to set our selves against such a false, sinfull, dangerous disturbing Principle as this is.

This Principle is strengthened by two Positions; both which which are dividing as well as the Principle it selfe.

First, That Magistrates have nothing to do with men in the matters of Religion.

Secondly, Conscience is a tender thing, and must have liberty; nothing must be done to men, who plead their consciences for what they do.

First, wee shall shew the Principle it selfe to be a dividing principle; Then the mistakes in those two assertions, that uphold this principle: As they strengthen the principle, so they strengthen division.

The principle is dividing; For,

First, It is an abhorring to nature. Is it not an abhorring thing to any mans heart in the world, that men should suffer that God to be blasphemed, whom they honour? and that nothing should be done for the restraining any, but to ask them why they doe so, and to perswade them to doe otherwise? There hath ever been as great a contentation amongst people about Religion, as about any thing, Exod. 8. 25, 26. Pharaoh bade Moses sacrifice in the land: But Moses said, It is not meete so to doe; for we shall sacrifice the abominations of the Egyptians: Loe, shall wee sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not stone us? Though they had leave of the King, yet the people would not endure it.

Secondly, It is against the light of Scripture, Deut. 13. 6. If thy brother the sonne of thy mother, or thy soune, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy boosome, or thy friend, which is as thine owne soule, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us goe and serve other gods, which thou hast not knowne, nor thy fathers, Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken to him: neither shalt thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare him, nor conceale him: But thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people.

Let not any put of this Scripture, saying, This is in the Old Testament, but we finde no such thing in the Gospel; for we find the same thing, almost the same words, used in a Prophece of the times of the Gospel, Zech. 13. 3. In the latter end of the 12. Chapter, it is prophecyed that those who pierced pierced Christ, should looke upon him, and mourne, &c. having a spirit of grace and supplication powerd upon them. Chap. 13. 1. There shal now be opened a fountaine for sinne and for uncleanness: &c. Vers. 3. It shall come to passe, that be that takes upon him to prophesse that his father and his mother that begate him, shall say unto him, Thou shalt not live, for thou speakest lyes in the name of the Lord: And his father and his mother that begate him, shall thrust him through when he prophesieth.

You must understand this by that in Deut. The meaning is not, that his father or mother should presently run a knife into him, but that though they begat him, yet they should be the means to bring him to condign punishment, even the taking away his life: those who were the instruments of his life, should now be the instruments of his death.

Thirdly, It is a dividing principle, because by it the reines are let loose to all kind of wantoness, and spirit of opposition, in the matters of Religion. Men naturally are wanton in nothing more then in the things of Religion; and corrupt spirits are bent upon, and pleased with opposition in these things, above any other: for being things suppos'd to have an excellency in them, and above reason, and so liable to contradiction from men of corrupt minds, if there be nothing to restrain men from opposing one another in them; the wantonnesse and pride of mens hearts will carry them forth to infinite jarrings, contentions, and divisions.

If it be said, Christ hath left spiritual means to helpe this.

It is answered, Christ's spiritual means are to work in a spiritual way upon the heart to change it, and secondarily upon the outward man; while Christ's means are working thus, externall means may keep evill from breaking forth in the outward man; Christ hath not left the outward man at absolute liberty to do what it will, till spiritual means be made effectuall to the heart, especially considering if you grant this liberty, men may choose whether any of those spiritual means of Christ should at all come at them.

The first position that upholds this dividing principle: Magistrates have nothing to do in the matters of Religion.
It must be grantend, that a Magistrate is not an Officer of Jesus Christ the Mediator in his Mediatoy Kingdom.

There is a two-fold government that Christ hath:

1. One as he is God equall with the Father, together with the Father, ruling heaven and earth.

2. Another, as he is God and man, Mediator, in a peculiar Kingdom of his that he hath by way of dispensation from the Father.

Now the Magistrate is an Officer of God, both the Father and the Son, in the generall government of the world. But he is not the Officer of Christ, in that Kingdom of his that he hath by way of dispensation from the Father, that Regnum Mediatorum, as Divines call it: No, though he be a Christian Magistrate, there are no Officers of that, but such as are by divine institution set down in the Word; his Christianity doth only add unto him further ability to execute the work of his Office in a better manner, it adds no new authority to him: An Infidell Magistrate converted to Christian Religion, is thereby better enabled to performe the duty of his place then before, but he had the same authority before; it was his sin, he did not use his Authority now as he is able to do; though he be a Christian who is a Magistrate, yet the power of his Magistracy belongs to another Kingdom, different from that the second person hath as he is Christ the Mediator.

But doth not this then exclude him from the exercise of any power in the matters of Christian Religion?

No, for God in the exercise of his power governing the world, hath a speciall ayme at the promoting the Kingdom of his Sonne Christ the Mediator: Therefore Magistrates exercising this power of God, ought to ayme at these ends, that God himselfe aymes at in the exercise of his own power, that is, to be usefull to Christs Government in his Church, and for the good of his Church: God in all his wayes, from the beginning of the world, hath aymed at the setting up his Son to be King upon his holy Hill, at the promoting of the glory of him who is God-man: and if his Ministers doe not make use of their power to this end, when this Kingdom of his Sonne comes to be revealed to them, he will require it at their hands.

The

A Magistrate not an Officer Regus Mediatorio.

Object. 2.

Answ.
The power that God invested Magistrates withall in matters of Religion in the Old Testament, is so full and clear in that which God gave to the Kings of Judah and Israel, that to name particulars would almost make a volume; I find many who write about this subject, spend most of their strength here, but I wholly forbear mentioning instances in this, because it is granted by all that they had power; but the argument from thence to the power of Magistrates in the times of the Gospel, prevails little with those who hold this Dividing Principle we are now speaking of. For they tell us that their power was typicall, they in the exercise of such a power were types of the Kingly power of Christ, for we find glorious promises of dominion and stabillity made to Christ in the persons of many of those Kings.

2. They tell us, that it is no argument, because Priests and Levites had in time of the Law power in temporal things, in ordering the affairs of the State; therefore Ministers should have civil authority now: So neither is it an argument, because Magistrates had power then in spiritual things, therefore our Magistrates should have the like now.

3. They tell us that the Church and Commonwealth of the Jews were mixed in one; hence to be a stranger from the Church is expressed by being a stranger from the Commonwealth of Israel, Ephes. 2. 12. and therefore their Magistrates were Church-officers as well as Civil.

4. That the people of the Jews were brought up in a more servile way then Christ would have his Church, in the times of the Gospel, brought up in: Compulsion therefore in matters of Religion was more suitable to their condition, then it is to our Jerusalem which is free.

5. The whole Church was then bound to be under the same State-government; the Laws of their State were by divine appointment; their Kings were chosen by God; but now Christ chooses his Church out of all Nations of the earth, and leaves them to the several Governments, Laws, Officers of several Nations for their Civil State.

1. I confess were there nothing but merely examples or Laws from the Old Testament to confute this dividing Position, to an examining eye the argument would hardly be cogent gent or satisfactory, only so far as there is a common reason and equity in them, and to all the judiciall bind now as well as they did then.

2. So far as the New Testament approves of for the times of it, what was formerly done in the Old.

The strength of the argument from the power of Magistrates in the Old Testament, lyes in these two.

First, there is a common reason and equity, what ever the strength of such kind of arguing be from one Spirituall Ordinances to prove another, yet without all question, it is strong enough from one Civill Ordinance to prove another, though it be conversant about spirituall things.

It is the Dictate of Nature, that Magistrates should have some power in matters of Religion. The generality of all people have ever thought it equal. It hath been ever challenged in all Nations and Common-wealts. The Heathens would never suffer their gods to be blasphemed, but punish such as were guilty thereof by the power of the Magistrate. Socrates was put to death for blaspheming their multiplicity of gods.

21. Surely there is a common equity, for there is a necessity of it as truly now as there was then. I cannot argue the being of Spirituall Ordinances from our need of them, not thus there is such an institution, for the Church hath need of it; but rather thus, I find it in the Word to be an institution, and therefore the Church hath need of it. But in naturall or civill things this way of arguing is strong enough; there is need of such a help, and therefore we should seek to have it.

Now sure the need we have of such a power, is exceeding great, we were in a most miserable condition if we had no externall civil power to restrain from any kinds of blasphemies and seducements. The condition of the Jews, O how happy was it in comparison of ours, if this were denied us! for if any one of theirs did blaspheme God, or seek to seduce any from him, they knew what to do with him, besides persuading him to the contrary; but if any should seek to seduce the wives of our bosoms, children of our bodies, friends as dear to us as our own lives, into those ways that we think in our consciences will undo their souls to all eternity, yet we must only desire them they would not do so, we must only admonish.
nigh, and seek to convince them, or reprove them, but restrain them we cannot: If the deliverance or us from the pedagogy of the Law hath brought us into this condition, our burden is greater in this thing then any that the Law laid upon our fore-fathers. Hath Christ delivered us from one burden to lay a greater upon us? Must we now see those who are dearest to us drawn into the ways of eternall destruction, and stand and look on, but no way left to help them, or our selves, unless we can persuade to the contrary? Surely our condition is very sad: Have we not cause to say, Lord let any burden of the Ceremonial Law be laid upon our necks rather then this? If there were a company of mad men running up and downe the streets with knives and swords in their hands, endeavouring to mischief and kill all they met with, and we must doe nothing to restraine them; if we could persuade them to doe otherwise, well and good: but that is all we can do for help; what a dangerous thing were this? The case is the same, when those who are mad with damnable Heresies, run from place to place, seeking to draw all they can from the truth; If we have no means of help but arguments, it is ill with us: Surely God hath not put his people into such a sad condition as this is, he hath provided better for his people then thus.

Thirdly, wee find in the Record of Scripture mention of Heathen Magistrates, who had nothing hut the light of nature to guide them, interesting themselves in matters of Religion, and this the Holy Ghost relates in way of commendation of them for this thing.

The argument from these examples cannot be avoided, as that which is taken from the practice of the Kings of Judah. We read Ezra 7.26. Artaxerxes interposes his power in matters of Religion, and Ezra blesses God for it, Whosoever will not doe the Law of thy God, and the Law of the King, let judgement be executed speedily upon him. And in the next words, Ezra blessed God, who put it in the heart of the King by these and other means, to beautifie his house. The making such a Law was one notable means whereby the House of the Lord came to be beautified.

Thus also Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 3. 29. I make a Decree that that every people, nation and language, who speak any thing against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dung-hill, &c. This the Scripture records as a work of the Kings repentance.

The King of Nineveh, Jonah 3, by the decree of his Princes and Nobles, proclaims a Fast, and commands every one to cry mightily to God, and to turne from his evil way.

Further, let us see how the holy Ghost justifies this power of the Magistrate in the times of the Gospel: First, in the Prophesies of the times of the Gospel: Secondly, in divers places in the New Testament.

For Prophesies, the fore-named place, Zech. 13. 3, cannot be put off: Isa. 49. 23. Kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and Queens thy nursing mothers. The protection of their civil peace is not sufficient to give them such a denomination of nursing fathers and mothers.

Esay 60. 10. The sons of strangers shall build up thy walls, and their Kings shall minister unto thee: They shall not only be favourers of them, but as Kings they shall minister to them, even by their power: So Rev. 21. 24. The Kings of the earth shall bring their glory and honour to the Church: there is such a time coming. This surely is more then meerly to protect their outward peace.

In the New Testament, Rom. 13. 4. He is thy Minister for thy good. 1 Pet. 2. 13, 14. Submit your selves to every ordinance of man for the Lords sake, whether it be to the King as to the suprem, or unto Governours, which are sent for the punishment of evill doers, and the praise of them that doe well. Now seeing the Scripture speaks thus generally, For thy good, and for the punishment of evill doers, and praise of them that doe well, Non distinguendum ubi Scriptura non distinguiz, Except the nature of the thing require, why should we distinguish where the Scripture doth not?

You will say, The nature of the thing spoken of will require that it must be restrained to those things that belong to his cognizance.

Such a limitation must of necessity be granted; therefore
It is true that the Magistrate cannot command every good thing, nor punish every evil; the abstruse controversies in Religion come not under the cognisance of a Magistrate, as a Magistrate; only such things as are against the rules of common justice and equity, and the common light of Christianity, where he is to govern Christians, for he is to enjoyn and punish such things only as if he were not; the community of people which sets him up, ought to enjoyn and punish, for he hath his power from them: but of this more in the next Principle.

If you shall say, But those Scriptures speaking of Civill Magistrates, we must understand them to be meant onely of civill things.

The Magistrate hath his appellation civil, because the power that he exercises is civill, the things that he do are civill; he cannot do the works of a Church-officer, by all the power he hath, as administer Sacraments, and the like; but this hinders not the use of his civil power, and the doing of external acts upon the outward man, subervient to spiritual good; indeed what he doth, hath not any spiritual efficacy in it, for then it were worship. Though he cannot work in a spiritual way upon mans soule, by his power, it is not an Ordinance set apart by God to that end, yet he may by the exercise of his power upon the outward man, restrain it from the external act of evil; or bring it to an external good; his power still that he exercises is civill, yet ordered to the help of spiritual good, either removendo probibenm, or applicando medias externas, or cohicenda a malo externo; removing outward things that hindered, applying outward means, or keeping from outward evils. Whatsoever Commandement requires any duty, requires us to make use of all things that may help us to the performance of that duty; if there be any civil, natural, spiritual helps, we are bound to make use of all. Only here lies the great doubt, Whether hath God appointed the use of the Magistrates power to be a helpe to the things of Religion? Hath God made this to be an Ordinance for the spiritual good of people?

That it is by God an Ordinance for their civill good, is plaine out of those Scriptures before mentioned; but how doth it it appeare that ever God intended it to be an Ordinance for their spirituall good?

What naturalnes there is in any thing, it hath it from God, for nature is Gods worke, if there be a naturalnes in it to work upon the outward man, for the furtherance of spiritual good; this is from God: if I should use it to work upon the inward man expecting a spiritual efficacy, then I make it an ordinance to myself, and in against God, presuming to put more in a creature of his, then it was appointed to. In this consisted the evil of ceremonies, they were used in a spiritual way, to work upon the heart of man, by vertue of that institution that man put upon them, beyond what God in their natural power ever put into them.

But how can natural and externall things be helps to things spiritual and divine?

Any mans reason, yea sense may tell him, that the taking away externall hinderances, and the putting upon externall use of divers things, may keep from much evil, and further much good that is spiritual and divine; though it cannot reach to the spiritualnesse and divinenesse of that good, yet it reaches to the externall action, without which that divine and spiritual good cannot be. Wherefore seeing the New Testament sets out the power of Magistrates, and requires submission to them in such generall terms; from this we may draw such a conclusion, Therefore the Lord intended to leave Christians for their subjection to Magistrates, to the light of nature, & to the equity of the generall rules that were in Scripture before time; if God should say, Ye are Christians, see you part not with that liberty Christ hath purchased for you; we may give this account, Lord we found in thy word that once thou didst make use of the power of Magistrates in matters of Religion, & in the New Testament there was nothing revealed to forbid their power in them; nay Lord, Thou toldst us there, that thou hast appointed them for our good, and to be a terror to evill works in the generall. From thence we gathered, that in our yeeiding to their power, it was thy will we should make use of those generall rules in Scripture wee found before the times of the Gospel, & of the light of nature. Being also persuaded it was thy mind we should make use of all the natural helps we could for our spiritual advantage, & we found it recorded in thy Word that thou didst allow of the exercise of such power in the things of Religion, even to those who had only the light of nature to guide them and being the use of it reached only to the outward man, we did not see a necessity of a special institution for this, knowing what naturalness it had in it, to be an external help was put into it by thy self, therefore we made use of it. God will accept of this account. Add yet a consideration or two.

1. When the Apostles were convented before Civil Authority about matters of Religion, we never find that they pleaded for themselves. You have no power to meddle with us in the things of Religion, they belong to Jesus Christ only who is our King, & to that government he hath set in his Church; No, their plea was only the justness of their cause, that what they professed and preached was the truth of God, they did it in obedience to God.

2. If all men be bound to improve all the abilities, gifts, talents they have for the propagation of the Gospel, the Magistrates are bound to improve those which are peculiar to them; If a man hath more wisdom than others, or a greater estate, or more friends, he is to make use of all these for helps to the furtherance of Religion; if then a man hath more power then others, he is to improve that likewise, not only by countenancing what he conceiveth to be right, but by all other means according to the dictates of Reason, not forbid by Scripture.

But we have often heard that of Tertullian urged; If it be therefore said it is lawful because the Scripture doth not forbid, it is therefore unlawful because the Scripture doth not command.

Ans. In the matters of God's worship this rule is to be urged, but not in matters civil or natural, though in their way subservient to worship, their Reason may guide very far.

But you will say, What? will you then make the Magistrate a Judge in all causes of Religion? he may be a wicked man, a Heathen, and yet a true Magistrate.

Ans. Whatsoever he be, yet he may be a Judge in matters of fact, & so far as Reason may go in matters of right, he may judge whether you do not go against your own principles, either either in your profession, acts of worship, or in the wrong you do to your brother; yea, he may judge whether your very principles be not contrary to the common light of the knowledge of God, that God hath given to men, and to the rules of humane justice. A Magistrate who is not skilful in Physicke or Navigation, yet he may judge Physitians and Mariners, if they wrong others in their way.

Chap. VI.

The second Position, Conscience is a tender thing, and must not be medled with.

Certainly Conscience is a very tender thing; and as men must take heed how they offer violence to their own consciences, so to the consciences of others. It is such a thing as is not in subjection to any creature in Heaven or Earth, only to God himself. Gerrard reports out of the Histories of France of a King of Navarre, writing to his Nobles, used this expression, The rule over consciences and soules is left to God alone: And of a King of Polonia, who was wont frequently to say, That God had reserved three things to himselfe: 1. To make something of nothing. 2. To know things future. 3. To rule over conscience. Maximilian the second used to say, There was no tyranny more intolerable then to seeke to rule over consciences. Henry the third, King of France, as the last pangs of death carried him into another world, had this speech, Learn of me that piety is a duty of man unto God, over which worldly force hath no power; this was spoken in the same Chamber where the Councell was held about that fatal Bartholomew day, in the year 1572.

But for all this, the Devill must not be let alone, though he be got into mens consciences, God hath appointed no City of refuge for him; if he flye to mens consciences, as Joab did to the horns of the Altar, he must be fetched from thence, or false upon there. Something may be done to men to keepe them Dominatum in conscientias & animas soli them from evil, and to reduce them, notwithstanding the plea of their consciences.

But what may be done to a man in such a case?

First, any man that pleads his conscience, may be required to give an account of his conscience; it is not enough for him to say, his conscience puts him upon such a thing, or keeps him from such a thing; he must give an account of the grounds upon which his conscience goes.

The word requires us to give an account to every man of that hope that is in us, if he requires it in a due way; we are bound to give no offence neither to the Jew nor Gentile: It is against the light of nature, that men in a society should do things of which they need give no account to any whatsoever.

Secondly, due enquiry is to be made, whether the Devil be indeed in the conscience, it may be you shall finde him in some other room of the soule; only he pretends to that as his sanctuary, hoping to escape better there then any where else; if he should be found in a mans will, he thinks he should be soon hunted out with violence, he could not scape there; but he hopes men will deal more tenderly with conscience; therefore either thither he will get, or at least he will give it out he is got in there, hoping you will enquire after him no further, when it is given out he hath taken refuge there, as a Malefactor searched after; it may be is lurking in some house not far from you; but that you may either not search, or cease searching, he causes it to be given out, that he is got into some strong Castle, or some other Countrey where there is little hope to come at him.

But how shall it be known, whether the Devil be in a man's conscience or not? Conscience is an inward room, who can see into it, what, or who is there?

It is a very hard thing to give a judgment, but these notes may help us much in discerning.

First, if I see a man owe private interest is much engaged in what he pretend conscience for, this may be enough to raise suspicion, though it can be no determining rule; for a man may in some things have his conscience put him upon that that where there is much of his owne interest; but this brings him under much suspicion, if the thing be not exceeding clear to the view of every man. 0

Secondly, if in the course of a man's life, he appears not to be much under the command of his conscience, but can take liberty as he pleases; if indeed a man in the general course of his life appears to be very conscientious; we had need take heed how we meddle with such a man in a way of opposition, except the evil we see now in him be very clear and gross;
but that man, who in the common course of his life, can tri-ble with his conscience, hath deprived himselfe of the benefit of this plea, as a man may forfeit the benefit of his freedome in the City by misdemeanours: so the benefit that otherwise might be had of such a plea may be forfeited by such loose-ness of life.

Thirdly, when the account a man gives cannot in any rational way be judged such, giving allowance to all his weaknesses, as should probably mis-lead him so grossly, as is apparent he is mislead. We must grant, that those may be reasons to one which are not to another; but when they appeare to gross, as after all allowances to weaknesses, they cannot in any common understanding reach to such a conclusion, we may at least suspect very much, that the evil of this man lies not in his conscience, but some where else; yet we should not do well to be too hafty and violent with such men; it may be a man for a while, may be so over-powred, that he is not able to render a rationall account of his wayes, but wait a while, and deal with him tenderly in love; consider his personal disabilities, his temptations, give him all the allowance you can; if one means prevail not to shew him his error, try another; if at one time you do no good upon him, see what may be done at another; consider, is it not possible, that even such weak things may appear to the conscience of a man that hath so many weaknesses, and lies under so many tem-pitations, to be for the present such grounds as he cannot without sin deny; and if so, you had need deale tenderly with such a man, except the grosseness of the evil requires severity.

4ly. If a man be proud and turbulent in his carriage, by that you may know the Devil is rather in the will then in the conscience; though an erroneous conscience may cause one to hold fast an error, yet it does not put upon proud, scornfull, turbulent behaviour: When a man by reason of his conscience (it may be the weakness of it) differs from his brethren, he had need carry himself with all humility and meekness, & self-denial in all other things; he should be willing to be a servant to every man, in what lawfully he may, that thereby he may shew to all, that it is not from any wilfulness, but merely the tendereness of his conscience, that he cannot come off to that which his brethren can doe, whom yet he reverences, and in his carriage towards them, shews that he yet esteems them his betters; but if a man that is weak, very much beneath others in parts and graces, shall carry himselfe high, imperious, contemning and vilifying those who differ from him, and be contentious with them: There is great reason to think, that the corruption is in the will rather then any where else; if there should be some conscience yet in these men, their heart-distemper may justly forfeit their right of pleading their consciences. Those who oppose them, if they doe it in a Christian way, may justifie what they doe before God; if God should call them to an account, and say, why did you deal so with such men who professed they were put upon what they held and did, by their consciences; If they can answer thus, Lord thou knowest we were willing to have dealt with them in all tendereness, if we could have seen conscientiousness in their carriage; but we saw nothing but scornfulness, pride, imperiousness, turbulency, conceitednes, we could see nothing of the Spirit of Jesus Christ acting them in their way; this their carriage perswaded us, that the sinfulnesse was got rather into their wills then their consciences.

51v: When a man is not willing to make use of means to inform his conscience, not of those means that are not against his owne principles, but goes on peremptorily and stoutly: Surely, when we see many of our Brethren differing from us, our respect to them should gain so much at least from us, that if there be any means left unused, for the further trying trying our opinions, or informing our judgements, we should make use of that means, a conscientious heart will do so.

The sixth note added, will seal up all; when a man by reason or Scripture is so put to it, as he must either renounce his error, or flye from some of his own principles, he will rather deny his principles, then yeeld himselfe convinced of his error; yea, when those principles are of great moment. The man that doth thus is the man spoken of, Tit. 3. 11. that is \textit{autoxathrurgos}, condemned of himselfe, \textit{An Heretick after the first and second admonition reject, because he is selfe-condemned;} wee must not reject every man that erreth in every little thing, no not after two or three admonitions, that was a prelatical, tyrannicall rule, but he must be an Heretick, and erring so grossly, as he is self-condemned in his error, and such a man suffers not for his conscience, when he is rejected, but for sinning against his conscience.

But who can know when a man is condemned of himselfe? the judgement of a mans owne conscience is a secret thing.

This is the strength of this hold the Devil gets into, he thinks he gets so deep, that you cannot get to it to find him out, and as for Gods displeasure who knows their consciences, these men will venture that. But by this Scripture, Tit. 3. it is clear, that a mans conscience may be so far seen into, as there may be a judgment passed upon a man, that he is a self-condemned man: To what purpose otherwise serves this Scripture? it is not like this Heretick would acknowledg that he was self-condemned, but yet the Apostle makes this the ground why he should be rejected; As if he should say, You see he will go against his own principles, against what his conscience tells him is truth, meerly to maintain a wicked Heresie that he is infected withall ; let him therefore plead what he will, reject him, for his own conscience condemns him, and GOD is greater then his Conscience, and knowes all things.

The third thing that is to be done to a man who pleads his conscience for evill, is, the great snare and danger he brings himself into, is to be declared to him, that by giving way to

\item \textit{let}
let evill into his conscience, he puts himself into such a condition, as whatsoever he doth, he must needs sin against God, so long as he holds his errour: Evill gets into the consciences of many very easily, because they think the dictates of their consciences will be sufficient to bear them out in what they do; but they are deceived, for an erroneous conscience does not bind, you sin notwithstanding your conscience bids you do it; and if you goe against this erroneous conscience, you sinneth too; what a miserable snare is this? you had need look to your selves then, and take heed what you let into your consciences.

The fourth thing is, to charge him, and if it be in a matter of consequence, to adjure him in the Name of God (who is the searcher of the hearts of men, and will judg them at the great day accordingly) that he deals plainly and sincerely, not to dare to put a pretence upon that which he knows his conscience cannot justify him in; if there be indeed any conscientiousness in the man, this will startle him.

But it may be this will not prevail, wherefore in the fifth place, whatsoever a man holds, though his conscience be never so much taken with it, yet if it cannot stand with the power of godliness, but destroys it, if this man be in a Christian society after all means used to reduce him, if he still perseveres in it, he is, notwithstanding his conscience, to be cast out of the society of the Saints; this is not a little matter, if a man hath any conscience in him, it cannot but be a dreadfull thing to him: If poyson be got into a glass, and you cannot wash it out, the poyson and glass too is to be thrown into the finck: Such a man as this is, with the conscience that he hath, is to be thrown upon the dung-hill. If a man by his wickedness cuts himself off from the mysticall body of Christ, the Church may cut him off from his visible, he hath forfeited his Church-priviledges.

Sixtly, If the errour with the profession of it be destructive to the State, and he cannot be reclaimed, he may likewise be cut off from it, or at least deprived of the priviledges of it, and benefits by it, notwithstanding his plea of conscience. This justifies the cutting off Jesuites and Priests, who teach people that the Crown is at the dispose of any forraign power, by which also subjects may be freed from their Allegiance. A Reverend Divine of ours; in a Treatise upon the pouring out of the 7. Vials, interprets the turning of the Rivers into blood; the execution of Justice even to blood upon the Romish Emisaries, the Jesuites and Priests, who come from the See of Rome, to take people off from their Allegiance.

7th. Whatever pretence of conscience a man hath, yet this cannot excuse him in any matter of apparent injustice done to his brother in his estate or goods: As suppose a man pleads conscience in the point of community of goods, yet if he take away his neighbour's goods by violence, his conscience cannot deliver him from the stroke of justice. The Papists pretend conscience for their murthers, for the Catholique cause, but this delivers them not out of the hands of justice; if a man pleads conscience that he is bound to marry more wives than one, and the like.

Eighthly, a man may bring himself under both Civill and Ecclesiasticall sword, not only for sins destructive and injurious to our brother, but for sins against God, if they be also against the light of nature, as blasphemy and grosse idolatry: Though the Sun be down, if you allow your servant a candle to work ordinary work by, and he put it out, he cannot plead he could not work, because it was dark: Man at first had Sun-light to work by, but our Sun is down, yet we have the candle of the light of nature; if we sin against that, our darkness can be no plea for us: and if he be a profess-ed Christian, and sins against the common light of Christianity, which he cannot but see, except he will shut his eyes, he is to be dealt with as a man that sins against the light of Nature.

Though such as are not Christians cannot by violence be compelled to profess Christian Religion, yet notwithstanding any plea of their conscience, they may be restrained, & that by violence: If other means will not do it, from an open blaspheming Christ, and the Scriptures, or doing any acts of open dishonour to them; acts of open dishonour to God done by any whom soever, as they are abominable, so such as have loved God and Christ, have accounted them unsufferable.

I suppose you have heard or read that notable story we have in the Book of Martyrs, of one Gardiner, though we undertake not to justify his practice as allowable in an ordinary way, he being but a private man, yet there were little question to be made of it had he been a Magistrate: He being a Merchant in Portugal, seeing the Cardinall offering the Host, though it were in the presence of the King and his Nobles, yet he runs to him and snatchtes it out of his hand, and throws it under his feet; if the King himself had done this, who would have condemned it?

Notwithstanding any mans conscience, he may be kept from endangering the salvation of others, no mans conscience can set him at liberty to hurt others.

Those who strengthen others in dangerous soule-damming principles, may be taken from them, the light of Nature teaches it.

In some cases, a private man may himself use violence to restraine men from evil; if a man should come to seduce my wife, or childe, in a matter I know will endanger their soule, if I could have no help by the Magistrate, I might if I had power keep him off. And what I might do by mine own strength, in case there were no Magistrate, I may call in the help of a Magistrate to do for me, when there is a Magistrate.

But you will say, you speak all this while of the restraint of men from dangerous grosse evils; but what if the evils be of lesse moment, can there be nothing done to men for the restraining them from such?

Yet, a man may be put to some trouble in those wayes of evil, that his conscience puts him upon, so farre as to take off the wantonneffe of his spirit, and the neglect of means: In times of liberty there is very great wantonneffe in mens spirits, they stand as in an equall ballance to receive truth or errour; every little thing calls the ballance in many mens spirits, as interest in a friend, esteem from such men of repute in some, in others the credit they conceive there is in being able to speake further to a businesse then other men, to have a further insight into it then others, and a thousand the like; now to help against such temptions, if there be some trouble laid in the way, of that which is apparently evil, so as men shall see there is something to be suffered in that way; if there be no more grainer of trouble then may help against this wantonness and neglect of means; I see no reason why any should be offended at this; indeed if there be a mistake, and the trouble be put into the wrong scale, if it be layd in the way of truth, let the fine be upon those who dare venture upon their mistakes; or if so much be put into the scale as will not balance only against wantonness, and neglect of means, but will be a sore temptation to decline the truth, and rather embrace that which is evil; then to endure so much trouble, this is very displeasing to God: If a man be asleep at a Sermon, his friend may pull his hand, yea he will not be offended though he give him a nip perhaps: but if he should strike him with a staffe on the head, so as to make the blood come, or cut his flesh with his knife, this would not be borne.

One step I think may be gone farther: Suppose a man be not wanton, but serious, and neglect no means to informe his conscience, and yet bee cannot yeeld, what shall bee done to such a man?

Though such a man should be dealt with in much tenderness and love, yet in such things as by his weakness he makes himselfe lesse serviceable to the Common-wealth, or Church, then other men, who have more strength; he may be denied some priviledges and benefits that are granted to others. I instance in that opinion of some Anabaptists, who deny the lawfulness of War; suppose their consciences after much seriousness in the use of means, cannot be satisfied; yet seeing by this error of theirs, they are made lesse usefull in the State then others, they should not think it much though they be denied many priviledges and accommodations that are granted to others, who venture their lives for the preservation of the State. If a mans body be weak, he cannot help it, yet by it he is not so usefull as others, why should he think much that he hath not whatsoever others by strength are able to attain to? Suppose a man should have such a principle in his conscience, that the K. hath an absolute arbitraty power, though it be his conscience; yet by it he is disnabled from employment and preferment in places of trust. So for the Church, suppose the government of it by Prelats had been lawfull, (which now we know was not) there had been no evil in denying to those who in conscience could not submit to it, their preferments of Deanries and Prebends, and the like.

But lest what I say in this should be abused, you must understand this denyall of places of profit or honour to men, because of that which their consciences will not suffer them to yeeld to, only such places, as the tenderness of their consciences in such a point makes them unfit to manage, if because their consciences differ from you in one thing, you will take advantage against them in other things that have no dependance upon that wherein they differ from you, and make them suffer in those things too, you now (to say no worse) begin to grow near to a way of persecution and tyrannie over your brethren, which Christ is displeased with. Wee accounted it in the Bishops not neare, but come up to tyrannie and persecution, when they would not suffer such as could not conforme to their Church-discipline and Ceremonies, not so much as to teach children the Grammar, or to practice Phyjick, or to preach Christ in places where there was no preaching, but people lived in darkenesse, perishing for want of knowledge. What dependance had these things upon their discipline and Ceremonies, supposing they had been right? Yes, they would foment their errours by this means.

Answ.

But seeing there was no dependance between their errours, (if you wil call them so) & these things, to deny the Church and Common-wealth the benefit of the gifts and graces of men, upon such a pretence that they will abuse their liberty, wee thought it was hard dealing, yea no lesse then persecution.

Suppose a man differs from his brethren in point of Church-Discipline, must not this man have a place in an Army therefore? Though he sees not the reason of such a Discipline in the Church, yet God hath endued him with a spirit of volour, and he understands what Military Discipline means; must he not have a place in a Colledge to teach youth Logick and Philosophy? may he not preach Jesus Christ to poor ignorant creatures? if you feare he will divulge his opinions, pinions, surely some other course may be taken whereby he may suffer as much as such a fault comes to; but therefore to deprive Church and State of what abilities God has given him, which might be very useful to them, and that before any such fault is committed, for fear it may be committed; the softest word I have to express myself against this, is, It is very hard dealing with your Brethren.

I have now gone to the uttermost line I can in shewing what is to be done to a man that pleads his conscience in things which we conceive are not right: I would now speak a word or two to men who have to deal with their brethren's consciences, and then to those who plead their consciences for their freedome.

To the first. Let those who have to deal with mens consciences, first take heed they do not vilifie and slight mens consciences, do not scorn at the plea of their consciences. What, this is your conscience? your conscience forsooth will not suffer you. Woe to them who offend one of these little ones; it were better that a mil-stone were hanged about his necke, and he were cast into the botteme of the Sea, Math. 18. 6. It is his conscience, and perhaps better informed then thine, and more tender; thou hast it may be a corrupt conscience, thy conscience is broke by thy sinning against it, or otherwise it is loose or benummed, no quicknesse in it, thou canst swallow down greater matters, therefore thou wondrest at those who are so nice-conscienced, who stand upon small matters; what if at the great day Christ shall own these to be truly conscientious, and honour them for obeying the voice of their consciences in small things, for not daring to offend them in any thing, where wilt thou appear? what is like to become of thee then? Or if their consciences be weak, not rightly inform'd, yet Christ expects thou shouldst seek to heal, to strengthen them, not to jeer and scorn them; that fearfulnesse of theirs to offend Christ, though in the particular they may be mistaken, shall be accepted, when thy boldness and ventrousnesse in taking thy liberty shall appear to be thy folly.

1. Those who are to deal with mens consciences, must be tender-hearted.

2. Take heed in your dealings with such, you make them not suffer more then Christ would have them suffer; do not abuse your Heart-divisions

The moan of a true conscientious man to God.

your power over them, so as to cause them to complain justly to God of conscience-oppression; Conscience-oppression is the most fearfull oppression; of all the cries in the world, the cries caused by it come up most swiftly to God. When an oppressed soul shall get alone, and make his moan to God; O Lord, thou who knowest the secrets of all hearts, thou knowest the desires of my soul in uprightness to know thy will; I can freely and comfortably appeale to thee. Thou knowest what a sad affliction it is to mee, that my judgement should be different from my brethren, whose parts and graces I prize farre beyond mine own. Thou knowest also there is no means for further Reformation, but I have been willing to make use of it as I was able, and what ever other helpe thou shalt make knowne to mee, I am ready to make use of it, that I may not be led aside into errore; and if thou wilt be pleased to reveal thy minde further to me, I am ready to submit to it. I should account it a greater happiness then all the comforts in the world can afford, to know what thy minde is in such things; but Lord, as yet I cannot doe this thing, except I should sinne against thee, thou knowest it: yet thou knowest also, that I desire to walke humbly and peaceably with my brethren, and in all meekenesse, submissenesse, and quietnesse of spirit, together with all diligence, I will waite till thou shalt further reveal thy minde to me. But Lord, in the mean time I find rigid dealing from my brethren; their spirits are imbittered, their speeches are hard, their ways towards me are harsh, yea Lord there is violence in them; Lord, thou knowest my spirit is not such as to need any such carriage of my brethren towards me; I am not conscious to my selfe (no not when I set my selfe most solemnly in thy presence) of stitnesse, wilfulness in my way; the least beane of light from thee, would presently turne my spirit what way thou wouldst have it goe.

Such a moan to God would prove a sadder businesse against such as shall occasion it, then if such men had strenght and spirits to answer bitterness, harshnesse, and violence, with bitterness, harshnesse, and violence.

Let me also on the other side speake to them who plead their consciences.

First, take heed you rest not in this as an empty plea, setting it as a Bulwark against anything that shall be said to you: why, it is my conscience, and who hath to do with my conscience? and so think you need look no farther, nor give any other account to your Brethren then this: This is to abuse your conscience, and the indulgence of God; and the respect he would have men shew to the consciences of his people; this is a hardening conscience against the truth, no true tenderness of it.

Secondly, If conscience be such a thing as none must have the power over it but God, such a thing wherein thou hast to deal so much with God, thou hast need keep it very clean; it is above all creatures, next to God, take heed of defiling it, oh keep it pure: Unclean consciences are good enough to prostrate to men, but consciences reserved for God need be kept unspotted and very clean. Doves love white houses, the holy Ghost loves a pure conscience.

Thirdly, thou wilt have none to command thy conscience, let conscience then command thee; if thou wilt rebell against thy conscience, it is just with God to suffer men to tyrannize over, thy conscience. When you complain of men seeking to have power over your consciences, lay your hand upon your heart, and say, Have not I rebelled against my conscience? I have resisted the power of it over me, just therefore it is that others should seek to bring it under their power.

CHAP. VII.

They who are for a Congregationall way, doe not hold absolute liberty for all Religions.

But for all that hath been said, Are there not yet a sort of men, who though they would colour over things, & put fair glosses upon their opinions and ways, saying they would not have such an absolute liberty as to have all religions suffered, yet do they not come near this in their tenets and practice? Do not men in a Congregationall way take away all Ecclesiastical means that should hinder such an absolute liberty as this? for they hold, every congregation hath sole Church power within it selfe, and they are not tied to give any account to others, but merly in an arbitrary way, will not this bring Congregational men charged for liberty to all Religions.
bring in a toleration of all Religions, and a very Anarchy.

First, I know none holds this, and how far men in a congregation all way are from it, shall appear presently.

In the clearing of this thing, I shall not argue for one side or other, I shall only shew you that there is in effect as much means to prevent or subdue errors, herefies, schisme in the congregation all way, (which you call by another name) as there is in that way, other Brethren endeavour to hold forth. I am not here to plead what is right, what is wrong, but only to shew you the difference is not great, so far as concerns this thing; what one holds, the same the other holds in effect; if this be done with clearness, then the great out-cry against that way, as fomenting divisions by opening a gap to all kind of liberty, will I hope be filled, and your hearts in some measure satisfied. I confesse weare it, as many of you are made to believe, that that way gives liberty, or at least hath no helpe against all errors & herefies, it must be acknowledged it were a means of most fearfull divisions, and in no case to be tolerated. But certainly you will find it far otherwise. This argument I am now about, (namely, how far Brethren agree in a matter of so great moment, and in that which they are by some thought most to disagree in, and their disagreement most feared, as a matter of dangerous consequence ) I know cannot be an unpleasing argument to you, although we cannot be ignorant that there is a generation of men that are vexed when they hear how near their brethren come to them in way of agreement, it serves more for their turns, to have the distance wide, they would keep open the wounds, yea widen them, but God forbid there should be such a spirit in you.

Wherefore for your help in this thing, these two things are to be premised.

1. That the only way the Church hath to keep downe errors or herefies is spirituall, as for other means they are extrinsecall to the Church; this all acknowledge: as for subjection to the Magistrate, if he pleases to interpose, so that both they and we must yeild.

2. The virtue of spiritual power works not upon the outward man, by its prevailing upon conscience; therefore so far as men are conscientious, so far it works, and no farther.
Now then see what difference there is in the Congregational way from the Presbyterian, for the prevailing, with men's Consciences, to reduce to the truth those who go astray from it.

First, Those in the Congregational may acknowledge that they are bound in conscience to give account of their ways to Churches about them, or to any other who shall require it; this is not in an arbitrary way, but as a duty that they owe to God and man.

Secondly, they acknowledge that Synods of others Ministers and Elders about them are an ordinance of Jesus Christ for the helping the Church against errors, schisms, and scandals.

Thirdly. That these Synods may by the power they have from Christ admonish men or Churches in his name, when they see evils continuing in, or growing upon the Church, and their admonitions carry with them the authority of Jesus Christ.

Fourthly, as there shall be cause, they may declare men or Churches to be subverters of the faith; or otherwise according to the nature of the offence, to shame them before all the Churches about them.

Fifthly. They may by a solemn act in the name of Jesus Christ refuse any further communion with them, till they repent.

Sixthly, they may declare, and that also in the name of Christ, that these erring people or Churches are not to be received into fellowship with any the Churches of Christ, nor to have communion with one another in the ordinances of Christ. Now all this being done in Christ's name, is this nothing to prevail with conscience?

You will say, What if they care not for all this? That is as if you should say, What if they be not conscientious? What if nothing can prevail with conscience?

I demand, what can any Church-power do more to work upon men's conscience for the reducing them from evil?

You will say, They may do all this with more authority than the Congregational way will allow.

We need not contend about the word Authority: But, how much higher is an act of authority in the Church, than for the Officers of Christ to act in the name of Christ?
If you say, private Brethren may admonish, and declare in the Name of Christ.

This is more than if any private Brethren should doe the same thing; for a Synod is a Solemn Ordinance of Christ, and the Elders are to be looked on as the Officers of Jesus Christ.

But our Brethren say, There is one means more in their way then the Congregational way hath, that is, if the sixe former will not work, then Synods may deliver to Satan.

In this very thing lies the very knot of the controversy between those who are for the Presbyterially, and those who are for the Congregational way; in reference to the matter in hand, namely, the means to, reducing from, or keeping out errors and heresies from the Church, in this lies the dividing business; But I beseech you consider what a punctum we divide here, and judge whether the cause of division in this thing be so great as there can be no help, and whether if an evil spirit prevail not amongst us, we may not joyn; For,

First, consider, what is there in this delivering to Satan? which is a seventh thing that our Brethren thinke may hopefully prevail with mens consciences, when the sixe former cannot.

Yes, say they, for by this they are put out of the Kingdom of Christ into the Kingdom of Satan, and this will terrifie.

This putting out of Christ's Kingdom must be understood, cive non errante, if the Synod judges right, not otherwise; Yes, this is granted by all.

Then consider, whether this be not done before, and that with an authority of Christ by those former six things; for Heretical Congregations, or persons are judged and declared in a Solemn Ordinance, by the Officers of Christ gathered together in his name, to be such as have no right in any Church-ordinance, to have no communion with any of the Churches of Christ: Now if this judgement be right, are not such persons or Congregations put out of the Kingdom of Christ, and put under the power of Satan consequently?
But they are not formally and juridically delivered up to Satan? What? shall we all divide, as to devour one another, for formality and juridically when those terms are not at all in Scripture, seeing we agree not in the substance of the thing, which may as really and fully prevail with conscientious men, as if formality were observed? especially, if we consider.

Secondly, that it is a great question amongst our Brethren, whether this traditio Satane were not Apostolical, peculiar to the power of Apostles, so as ordinary Elders had it not: and if it prove so, then non-communion will prove the utmost cenure the Church now hath.

But thirdly, if some brethren rise to a seventh degree, and others stay at six, which yet have such a power over conscience, that if they prevail not, the seventh is no way likely to prevail: Why should not the Apostles rule quiet us all, Phil. 3:15, 16. whereunto we have already attained; let us walk by the same rule: If in anything you be otherwise minded, God will reveal even this unto you. If we have attained but to six, and our brethren have attained to seven, let us walk together lovingly to the six; If God shall after reveal the seventh (we will promise to pray and study in the mean time) we shall walk with them also: why must it needs be now urged with violence, so as to divide else? and although we hold not the seventh, yet there is an ingredient in the six, that hath in it the strength of the seventh? For wherein lyes the strength of the seventh above the rest? is it not in this? that it is the last means Christ hath appointed in his Church to work upon the heart, this consideration hath much terror in it: Now those in the Congregational way say, that this is fully in the six, wherefore that it is as terrible to their consciences as the seventh can be to the consciences of our brethren, and that upon the same ground.

And consider now, my Brethren, whether the Congregational way be such, as if it be suffered, there will be no helpe to reduce an erring or heretical Church, but all Religions, Arrianisme, Mahometisme, any thing must be suffered. Surely men doe not deale fairly, in raising such mighty accusations upon.
upon such poor and weak grounds; this great aspersion, and huge out-cry, that these men would have all religions suffered, and in that way, there is no help against any Heretical Congregations, moulders and vanishes away before you.

Let no man yet say, All this that hath been said is nothing.

If you be conscientious who hear them say so, your own breasts must needs suggest an answer; surely these things would be very much to me, to prevail with my conscience.

But what if Congregations refuse to give account of their ways? what if they will not shew so much conscientiousnesse, as to regard admonitions, declaring against them, withdrawing communion from them?

So we may say, what if they will not regard your delivering them up to Satan, but will go on still?

You will say then, you will complain to the Magistrate, his power must come in to assist, to make them regard what the Church doth.

But now you have no further help from any intrinsicall power the Church hath; and as for subjection to the Magistrate, there we are upon equall ground, if he will interpose, he may assist and second the sentence of judging men subverters of faith, of withdrawing communion from them in the one, as well as the sentence of giving men up to Satan in the other; and we must still be subject here to suffer what is inflicted, if we cannot do what is required; only we do not go so far as some do, in this one thing, whereas they lay a Law upon the consciences of Magistrates, that they are bound to assist with their power the decrees of the church, taking cognisance only of the fact of the Church, that they have thus decreed, not enquiring into the nature of the things, we dare not lay any such bond upon the Magistrates conscience.

But say, that he is to assist the Church both upon the knowledge of what the Church hath done, and the knowledge of the nature of the thing, seeing every private man hath this power to be judge of his own act, it were a great misery upon those who have power over men, to be denied this power.
If it shall be said, But surely they do not agree so far, they do not come up to these six things mentioned. To that I answer, I do not in these deliver only mine own judgment, but by what I know of the judgments of all those Brethren with whom I have occasion to converse by conference both before and since; I stand charged to make it good to be their judgments also; yea, it hath been both theirs and mine for divers years, even then when we never thought to have enjoyed our own Land again; and if it be so, then let the Lord be judg between us and our Brethren, for those loud and grievous out-cryes there hath been against us in this thing.

But if the difference be so little, why do they not come in?

We come as far as we have light to guide us, we dare not step one step in the dark; if we do, we shall certainly fall into sin; whatsoever else we fall into, whatever the thing be to others, it would be our sin, if there were no other reason, but because we venture in the dark. We sayl up to our Brethren as far as we can see the Line of Truth, and beyond it we dare not venture in the least.

The controversy is not about little or great trouble, or inconvenience; if it were, such a charge might well make us blush, the inconvenience or trouble is little, yet a few men will not yeeld to their Brethren, who are many, for peace sake, but the controversy is about sin: now whether that be little or great, the difference cannot but remain, if one part shall urge upon another that which to them is sin, as to acknowledge any one thing to be a power of Christ, which he cannot see Christ hath owned in his word, must needs be; therefore the way to peace, is not the necessity of coming up one to another, because the thing is little, but the lowng, and peaceable, and brotherly carriage of one towards another, because the difference is but small.
The third dividing Principle, That nothing which is conceived to be evil, is to be suffered.

This is the other extrem ; some think all things should be suffered, and they are loose, and cause divisions on the one hand; others thinke nothing is to be suffered, and these are rigid, and cause divisions on the other hand: If any thing be conceived evil, either in opinion or practice, if instructions and persuasions cannot reform, there must be means used to compel: This is a harsh and a fower Principle, a disturbing Principle to Churches and States, to mankind. This Principle seldom prevails with any but those who have got power into their hands, or hope to get it. This must needs be a dividing Principle.

First, because of the infinite variety of mens apprehensions about what is good or evil, scarce three men agree any long time in their apprehensions of some things to be evil; if then nothing that is conceived to be evil must be suffered, there must needs be continual opposition between man and man.

This subjects the generality of men to suffer for many things which they can see no evil in, but are perswaded is good: this raises an animosity against those by whom they suffer; though a man can subject his body and estate to another, he cannot subject his reason to another: In the common ways of justice men are punished for those things which if they be guilty of, they cannot but acknowledge themselves to be worthy of punishment, as in Theft, Murder, Drunkenness, &c. And for the fact, they are tried in such a way, as they cannot but acknowledge is fit in reason to be subjected to; and therefore, though they suffer much, yet they will yeeld to it without disturbance.

But if this Principle prevails, every man almost is made lyable to punishment for thousands of things that he can see no reason why he should be punished: It is very hard to bring mens spirits to yeeld in such things.
But you will say, May not men be punished for things that they see no reason why they should be punished? For many malefactors may easily escape thus; guilt will quickly blind men, they will see no reason why they should be punished.

It is not what men say they see no reason for, or what it may be they indeed see no reason for; but what men cannot see reason for, though they should bend their understandings, and strength to the uttermost; yea, what the generality of mankind, and of that community of which a man is, cannot possibly see reason for, it is impossible for the generality of mankind, & the community of any Church or State, though they should be never so diligent to find out what is good, and what is evil, yet to be able to understand every thing that is evil, to be so.

If you will have laws made against all things, that such as are in authority conceive to be evil, then you must give them power to judge, not only by the rules of common justice and equity, and punish for the breach of them, but by the apprehensions that their own raised parts shall suggest unto them, and to punish men for not being raised to that height of understanding themselves have; but this power is more than is fit to be given to any men upon earth. This would bring tyranny both in State and Church.

For first, from whence is the rise of all Civill Power that any man, or society of men, are invested with? Is it not from the generality of the men, over whom they have power? Is it not the power which they themselves had, and which they might have kept amongst themselves? For who can say, that a Democracy is a sinnfull Government in it selfe? True, God establishes it upon particular men by his Ordinance, after it is given to them by the people, but the first rise is from them; and if so, then they should make no law to bring those men under punishment, who gave them their power, but such a Law as these men may possibly come to understand, to be equal and just, for they are their power: and it must be supposed, that they never intended to give a power beyond this. Those who give power, may limit power; they may give part to one, part to another; they may limit the matter about w*
The power shall be exercised, it shall goe so far, and no further; the utmost limits cannot goe beyond these rules of Justice which they are capable to understand. Hence it is, that all men in our Law, are tryed per pares, by their Peers, because it is to be supposed, that they are to be accounted offenders, and to be punished; only so as those who are equall with themselves, shall judge them worthy; and this likewise is the reason that Courts are in publicke, no man is to be shut out, because all men that will may behold the tryall, and justify the proceedings of Justice against offenders: It must needs be supposed then, that the rules by which the Judges go, must be the rules of common equity and justice, that all men may understand; beyond what these rules will reach to, the Civill State is not to punish, not every thing that men of deepe judgements and strong parts, may apprehend to be evil.

The power of the Church likewise extends not to the punishment of every thing, that either may by the Governours of it, be conceiv'd to be evil, or that is indeed evil.

As the rise of the Civil power shews, that only such things are to be punished by it, as are against the common rules of Justice and Equity; so the rise of Church power will shew, that only such things as are against common rules, such things as some way or other appeare to be against conviction, and are obstinately perswaded in, are by Church censur'd to be punished.

The rise of Church power is indeed different from the rise of the Civill, yet agrees in this, that it limits the Church, as the rise of the Civill doth the Civill power. The power of Governours in the State arises from the people, and they act their power that the Commonwealth gives to them: But the Governours of the Church have not their power from the members of the Church, but from Christ; neither do they act in the name of the Church, but in the name of Christ. It is true, the Members of the Church do design such men to such an Office; but being designed, now they are invested with the power of Jesus Christ, they exercise his power, and do act in his name, not in the name of the Church.
You will say, seeing the Church chooseth their Officers as well as the Common-wealth theirs: How doth it appeare, that the Officers of the Church do not exercise the power of the Church, as well as the Officers of the Common-wealth, the power of the Common-wealth?

These two things shew the difference clearly.

First, The Officers of the Common-wealth can do nothing by their power, but that which the Common-wealth may do without them, if they were not; they might have kept their Government in a Democracy, and if they had pleased, done any act of power by a major vote: But it is not so in the Church; if the Church be without Officers, they cannot doe that which belongs to Officers to do, they can have no Sacraments amongst them, neither can they have any spiritual jurisdiction exercised amongst them; only brotherly admonition, and withdrawing from such as walk disorderly, for their own preservation.

2dly. The members of the Church cannot limit the power of their Officers, so as the Common-wealth may the power of theirs: but if once a man be chosen to be an Officer in the Church, all that power that ever any in that Office had since Christ's time, in any Church in all the christian world, or ever can have to the coming of Christ again, falls upon him: If a man be chosen a Pastor, he hath as full power as ever any Pastor had upon the face of the earth, or can have by any Pastoral power: The Church cannot limit him, and say, You shall be a Pastor for such ends and purposes, but no further: The same may be said of the ruling, none upon earth ever had, or can have more power of ruling, then this man who is chosen into that Office. It is not thus in the State, all Kings have not the like power; in some Countries Kingly power reacheth so far, in others further, according to the variety of the Laws of the Countries, the agreements between them and the people: all Dukes, all States, all Parliaments have not the same power.

Now then, the rise of the power of Church-governors rising from Jesus Christ, and they doing what they doe in the Name of Christ, therefore they cannot punish any evill beyond what Christ would have punished.
You will say, What evills would Christ have punished, and what not?

Answ. Christ would have no evill punished that is repented of; if it be a known evill, then it must be repented of particularly; if it be a sin of ignorance, Christ forgives it upon a general repentance, although a man should never be convinced of it all his days; Yet, says Christ, I discharge him of all these, supposing the rise of his ignorance be not some wilful neglect. But if it be a sin committed through wilfulness, or continued in obstinately, then says Christ, I will have this man smart for such an offence; now comes in the power of the Church-officers, to doe in the Name of Christ what he would have done: But if they goe further, then they exercise a tyrannicall power, if they will punish every thing which they conceive to be evill, whether committed through ignorance and weakness, or wilfulness and obstinacy, in this they take upon them a higher power of punishing then Christ (according to the tenor of the Gospel) exercisse. For my part, says Christ, I goe but thus far with my power; If I see any of my Church sin through weakness and ignorance, labouring to understand and do my will, and mourning that they know no more, they do no better, I will passe by all; but if any shall appear wilfull and obstinate, I will deale severely with such a one.

If you say, If men have means of knowledge and strengthe, and yet continue ignorant and weake, should not such be dealt with as wilfull and obstinate?

No, says Christ, I do not goe by any such rule, for I have revealed my will in my Word, I labour by my Spirit and Ministers to convince men, yet I see after all means I use, there are many, who meerly through their weakness are not convinced, I pity them, I deal gently with them, I pardon them. Those then who will go further, they will punish for every evill; and if they use means to convince them, and they be not convinced, they will judge them obstinate, and proceed against them accordingly; these challenge and exercise not the power of Christ, but Antichrist. If Christ should deale so with them, as they deal with their brethren, it would go ill with them; If Christ should say, whatsoever I see evil in you, I will
I will not suffer it in you; if you are ignorant not withstanding means of light, I will deal with you as wilfull and obstinate, and never leave inflicting punishment upon you, till you be convinced, and do reform; could any of you stand before Christ dealing thus with you? Take heed of exercising that power over your Brethren (and that in Christ's name) that you would not have Christ exercise over you.

Both the Civill State and Church must take us as wee are fallen from that integrity of our first creation, nor as we came first out of God's hands: God the Creator may (indeed) punish us for not knowing or doing what is our duty to know or do, because he once made us perfect; but Man must not do so, Man must deal with his fellow-creatures, as men imperfect; one man cannot require of another that perfection not only of heart, but of external conversation, that God may, yea God-man our Mediator looks upon us in a state of imperfection, and deals with us accordingly, and thus he would have all do who have to deal with his people in his name.

But you said before, All things must not be suffered; now you say, some things must be suffered: Tell us then what must not, and what must.

I am persuaded most of you yeeld to the falseness of both these dividing principles; you verily believe all things must not be suffered, and yet you think it were too harsh to affirm that nothing is to be suffered; only here lies the difficulty, what must, and what must not be suffered. This hath been the unhappiness of pleading for toleration of any thing, yea of the very mention of it, that men presently cry out, and say, we would have every thing tolerated.

I confesse it is very hard to cut here right in the joynt; were I sure that none would blame or oppose what I shall deliver in this; but those who are willing to interest themselves in such a knotty business as this, and to be helpfull to us in the understanding how to untye such a knot, what ever such opposers should prove otherwise, I should not feare them for being too numerous.

What I have, I shall present unto you.

CHAP.
Heart-divisions.

CHAP. IX.

Rules to know in what things wee are to beare with our Brethren.

First, though men be known to erre in judgment in things not fundamental nor destructive; yet if after such knowledge of them, they would keep their judgments to themselves, so as not to hurt others, or disturb the peace; most men of moderate spirits, if not all, hold that such men are not to be punished either by Church or State: But though this be yielded to, yet the practices of many are against it, they have ways to draw forth men's judgments, though they would conceal them, and when they have drawn them forth, they make them suffer for their judgments these 3 ways.

1. First, by requiring men to subscribe to things which they suspect are against their judgments; they invent Articles, which if put to them, they know will pinch them, and draw forth their judgment, which when they come to know, they make them as Articles of Accusation against them. Surely such dealings as these are very harsh.

But you will say, Blessed be God, we hope we have done with forcing men to subscribe.

God grant that we never meddle with any thing answerable to that tyranny; heretofore we groaned under the drawing out mens judgements, and then the punishing them for them.

2. Secondly, if such things be put into oaths, which though a man should not hold in every clause, yet he may be godly, and a good Subject, and urge such oaths with violence under penalty, what is this but to punish a man for his judgment, though he would keep it to himself?

3. By propounding Questions to men, when they come to the choice of, or admission to any place of preferment, to draw forth their judgments, such questions as concern not at all the qualification of men to such places, & then deny them those places, either because they are unwilling to answer; or if you will needs have them answer, they discover their their judgements different from your, is not this to make men suffer for their judgments, though they would live peaceably, keeping them to themselves? Here is not that suffering of Brethren that Christ would have.

2ly. In things controversial and doubtfull amongst godly and peaceable men, though there should be a declaration of difference of judgment, and some different practice, yet there is to be a forbearance of compulsory violence; we must not be to one another in such things as these are, as that Gyant we read of, who laid upon a bed all he took, and those who were too long, he cut them even with his bed, and such as were too short, he stretched them out to the length of it. Vi-rily this is cruelty, God hath not made men all of a length nor height; mens parts, gifts, graces differ; mens tempers, apprehensions, educations are various: and if there be no suffering one another in things not clear, all the world must need-be quarrelling, there will be flaming iniquities, sidings and opposings one another continually, except not only mens bodies and eflates, but their very souls also be brought under forbid slavery.

Our Brethren of Scotland writing against the tyranny of Prelates, when they were under it, in that Book, entituled En-GLISH and POPISH CEREMONIES, have this passage: If the error of Conscience be about things unnecessary, then it is tutor pars, the fairest & safest way, not to urge men to do that which in their consciences they condemne. And the Ministers of the Protestant Churches in France, giving their judgments, De pace inter Evangelicos procu-randam, How peace amongst the Protestant in Germanie may be had, set forth by Durus, say thus: (a) Let all matters controversial be brought into such a certain model, as may give satisfactio to both parties; and that if it be possible, framed out of the very words of Scripture: and let no man require any thing else of his brother. Zane, in precepr. 4. hath this notable speech: (b) That which I say (fays he) is diligently to be observed, that those who would stir up Princes to have all people, Kingdomes, Common-wealths, which (not cipibus, nec Ecclesia Christi bene consulat.

overthrowing the fundamentals of Religion, differ from them in any thing,) condemned of heresie, excluded from friendship, driven out of their territories, these are no friends, says he, either to their Princes or to the Church of Christ.

Many thinke they doe great service to Christ, the Church and State, if they can stir up Magistrates to suppress whatsoever they conceive are errors; it may be their hearts are upright in the main, they aym at peace, but certainly they cause much disturbance in Church and State.

Bishop Davenant in a little Book, entituled, His Exhortation to brotherly love amongst Churches, the ninth Chap. hath this title, that Brotherly communion between Churches Evangelical, is not to be cut asunder, because of divers opinions about Questions controversall. And in the beginning of the 10. Chapter, This is to be premised, The bonds of the brotherly communion of Christian Churches ought not to be dissolved upon every difference of opinions, but only for the denying or opposing Fundamentals. Here see the moderation of a Prelate.

Thus Cyprian of old delivered his opinion, and practised it accordingly, differing from many of his brethren, but with all professeth, That he meant not to prescribe or give Laws to any; that he would not contend with any of his Colleagues, so as to breake divine concord, and the peace of our Lord; that he was farre from judging or censuring any of his Brethren, or cutting off from his communion any that were of a different minde; and that in such case none ought to constraine his Colleague by tyrannical violence, (wherein glancing at the violent proceeding of Stephen to whom he wrote) to a necessity of believing or following what he thinks meet. This modesty and charity of Cyprian is very often and very deservedly commended by St. Augustine, says D. Potter, an Episcopal man.

That this may go downe the better, or at least that mens spirits may be in some measure moderated, take these following Considerations.
First, this contending about every difference of opinion, & urging our Brethren with what we conceive right, in matters of controversy, crosseth the end of Christ in his Administration of differing gifts to his Church, and humane society, and his revealing truths in a different way, some more darkely, some more clearly; Christ could easily have given such gifts to all, or revealed all truths so clearly, that every man should have been able to have seen every truth. Surely Christ did not disperse gifts, and reveal truths so differently, to that end, that there might be continual matter of strife and contention in his Church, and in humane societies; nor that there should be provocation to the exercise of cruelty one upon another, but rather that there might be the exercise of love, charity, forbearance, meekness, long-suffering of one towards another; Christ bids us, charges us to be at peace amongst our selves. If we should say, O Lord Jesus, wouldst thou have us be at peace one with another? there are many things in thy Word, that we and our Brethren have different apprehensions of; for though (blessed be thy Name) the great necessary things of salvation be clearly revealed, yet many other things are too dark to us, that through our weakness we cannot all of us see the same thing. Now is it thy mind, O blessed Saviour, that one man, who conceives himself to understand the truth, (and that it may be rightly) compell another to his judgment? And doth thou also require, that we must not bring our judgments to our Brethren till thy light brings them? How then is it possible that we should be at peace one with another?

Do not all Divines say, There are some things in Scripture wherein the Elephant may swim, some things where the Lamb may wade? matters of Discipline are acknowledged by all, not to be revealed with such clearness, but that truly conscientious, upright, diligent men may not be able in many things to see the mind of Christ in them. And to what end hath Christ done this think you.

Compulsion in such things as we are speaking of, is to strain Justice so high, as to make it summa justitia, which is the degeneration of it: As Physicians say of the uttermost degree of health, it is a beginning of sickness: If Justice be wound wound up a peg too high, it breaks: Though Justice were to be managed by the most holy, wise, self-denying, and meek men upon the earth, yet there would be much danger in winding it up to the highest; for it is administered by men full of infirmities, to men full of infirmities, therefore God will not have it strained too high, he will rather have charity to be above Justice, then Justice to be above charity. This I have out of Luther, though he was a man of a fiery spirit, he could tell how to contend where there was cause; yet in an Epistle that he writes to the Divines of Norimberc, upon occasion of dissentions risen amongst them, he hath this passage, Judgement must serve, not rule over charity; otherwise it is one of those four things that Solomon says troubles the earth, namely, a servant ruling, or the Maid beire to her Mistresse; if therefore you would have peace sayes he, charity must rule over justice, you must not suffer justice to rule over charity.

3ly. If men goe upon this principle, they will be in danger of opposing truth as well as falshood, and compelling to falshood as well as to truth; for in matters doubtful & controversial amongst good and peaceable men, it is not easy to have any sure grounded confidence, as to be out of all danger of mistake; there is more confidence needfull in a thing that we impose upon others, then in what we practice upon ourselves; if a thing be to us rather true then otherwise, we may lawfully do it; but this is not enough to be a ground for the imposing it upon others, who cannot see it to be a truth; in such a case we had need be very sure. The weak driftlings of our probabilities, guesses, & opinions, are not enough to cause the stream of another mans conscience to stop, yea to turne its course another way; especially considering, that in such things we have oftentimes misgiving thoughts our selves; yea, and not long since we were confident, that what we now condemn was true; and what we now are ready to enjoyn others, we then did as confidently condemn. There must be great care taken, that when we seek to pluck up tares, we pluck not up the wheat also; this may be understood of things, of truths and falshoods, as well as of persons; we may be mistaken in the one as well as in the other. Pluck not up the tares. Christ does not forbid casting out any wicked men from the Church; but as...
Hierome hath it, in those Countries tares were very like the wheat; therefore take heed, says Christ, what you do in plucking up; when you have to deal with men whose condition is any way doubtful, be sure they be hypocrites, or else meddle not with them, do not pluck them up upon every surmise, because you think they are not right, for then you may pluck up a wheat as well as a tare, he may prove to be a godly man; therefore you had better let tares grow; if you do but thinke that such men are not right, you were better let them continue in the Church, then by venturing upon them, to be in danger to pluck up the wheat.

Thus in respect of things good or evil, there are some things apparently evil, they are rather thistles and briers, then tares, we may freely pluck up them; but other things, though perhaps they may prove evil, yet they have some likeness to good, so as you can hardly discern whether they be good or evil. Now faith Christ, take heed what you do then, do not out of eagerness oppose all evil, to get out every tare, pluck out some wheat too; what if that you oppose with violence as evil, prove to be good? you had better let forty tares stand, then pluck up one wheat.

Fourthly, If men take this power upon them, to compell men to do whatsoever they conceive good, and to deny or forbear whatsoever they conceive evil, they take more power upon them than ever the Apostles took. The government of the Saints under the Apostles, was a great deale more milde, sweet, gentle then this. The rule the Apostles went by, Phil. 3, 15. was, Let therefore as many as be perfect be thus minded; and if in anything ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveale even this unto you; nevertheless, whereunto we have already attained, let us walke. If any should be otherwise minded then I or the other Apostles, God will reveale it in due time, we will not force him, only let us walke up to what we have attained. This rule, Zanchy, faith Augustine, would repeat a thousand time; and Christofome hath a good note upon this place, he does not say, God will bring them to it, if they be otherwise minded, but God will reveal it, noting the love and goodness of God to those who are otherwise minded, excusing them that it was not through wickedness, but for want of know-ledge.
ledg that they did otherwise, Acts 15, where the Apostles and Elders were met together, the furthest they would take upon themselves, was to lay no other burden but those necessary things. The false teachers put a yoke upon them, which was such a burthen, that neither they nor their fore-fathers could bear, v. 10. yet it was no juridicall authority that these had over them; surely the yoke they put upon them, in the judgments of all was but doctrine: But for us, say the Apostles, we finding what the mind of the Holy Ghost is, dare not yoke you as they did; all that we burden you with, is these necessary things, no Church-officers, no Synod can go further then this, but certainly every matter in controversy amongst godly and peaceable men cannot be conceived to be necessary.

Rom. 14. 14. is a very usefull place for this, Him that is weak in the faith receive, but not to doubtfull disputations; Receive him, though he understands not all you do; do not trouble him, neither with nor for doubtfull things: One believeth he may eate all things, another who is weake eateth herbes; let not him that eateth, despise him that eateoth not; neither let him that eateoth not, judge him that eateoth, ver. 5. One man esteemeth one day above another, another esteemeth every day alike; let every man be fully persuaded in his owne mind. Upon this he gives generall rules, to doe all to the glory of God; all these people were not in the right, for a man not to eate flesh out of conscience, when the thing was not forbidden, certainly was a sin; or to make conscience of a holy day, which God required not, was a sinne: Now the Apostle did not come with his authority, and say, I will make you leave off keeping such days, or you shall eate, or to abstain thus as you do, is evil, and it must not be suffered in you. No, the Apostle lays no Apostolicall authority upon them, but tells them, That every man must be fully persuaded in his owne mind, in what he doth; and who art thou that judgest another mans servant? the Lord hath receiued him. And yet the Governours of the Churches in the Primitive times might upon much stronger grounds have stood upon such a principle, then any Governours of the Church now can; there was lesser reason why they should suffer any difference in opinion or practice amongst them, then why we should suffer differences amongst us; for they had men amonst amongst them immediately inspired, who could dictate the mind of Christ infallibly; they could tell them the certain meaning of any Scripture. The burden of being under the determinations of such men in points of differences, had not been so great as subject to any Governors now in such cases would be; our differences are usually about the meaning of such or such Scriptures, in which both sides think they have the right, & profess one to another, as in the presence of God the searcher of all hearts, that if they could but see the meaning of such a Scripture to be so as their brethren believe it is, they would soon agree: and yet though there were in those Primitive times such means of reconciling differences more then we have, yet there was much mutual toleration amongst them; they used no compulsive violence to force those who through weakness differed from them, to come up to their judgments or practice. Yes, It is also more tolerable in Papists, not to tolerate any difference in opinion or practice, because First, they believe they have an infallible Judges to decide all Controversies. 241. They hold implicite faith in the judgment of their Clergie, to be sufficient warrant to justify the belief or practice of the people, or of any particular man, and yet they suffer differences in opinions and practices amongst them; They have their severall orders of their Monks, Priests, Friars, Jesuites, they differ very much one from the other, and yet agreeing in the root, they are suffered, supposing those two helps to union; they have an infallible Judges, and implicite faith: we have cause either to admire at their moderation in their mutually bearing one with another, or at the disquietness, the rigidness of spirits amongst us, who cannot bear with lesser things in their brethren differing from them; for we professe, we know no such externall infallible Judges, upon whom we may depend; neither dare we warrant an implicite faith. We teach men, that every man must be persuaded in his own heart, must see the rule of his own actions, must give an account of his own way to God: now what can men that have the most gracious & peaceable spirits, you can imagine, doe in such a case? Before they believe or do what their brethren believe or do, they must see the authority of the Word to ground their faith or actions; and for the present, though though sincerely willing to know God's mind, and diligently laborious to search it out, yet they cannot see it: and yet according to this fowr, rigid principle, they must be forced to it by violence, what is it but to command the full tale of brick to be brought in, where no straw can be had, if this be not? Straw might be had in Egypt by seeking for it; but here, after the most careful and painful seeking for it, yet it cannot be had.

517. By this principle, the finding out of much truth will be hindered; it will flife men's gifts & abilities in arguing and discoursing about truths. We know fire is beaten out by striking the flint. Although differences be very sad, yet the truth that comes to light by them, may recompence the sadnesse. You cannot beat out a place for a window to let in light, but you must endure some trouble; Children will think the house is pulling down, when the window is beating out, but the Father knows the benefit will come by it: he complains not that the dust and rubbish lies up and down in the house for a while, the light let in by it will recompence all. The trouble in the discussions of things by Brethren of different judgments may seem to be great, but either you or your posterity hereafter may see cause to bleffe God for that light hath been, or may be let into the Churches by this means; men of moderate spirits doe bleffe God already. But if according to this principle, the governors of the Churches must suppress whatever they conceive not to be right, to what purpose should there be arguing and discussing of severall judgments and severall ways?

You will say, Those who are the Governors, they, or those whom they call to consult with, may argue and discuss, but not others.

Is not this to deny the Church the benefit of the gifts and graces of thousands of others? The Church may soon receive as much prejudice by this, as the trouble caused by some differences comes to.

Sixthly, This lays a great temptation to idleness and pride before the guides of the Church: Men are naturally subject to sloth, and may not this principle suggest such a temptation as this? What need we take care or pains to search into truths, to be able to convince gain-sayers, to carry things with strength of Scripture & Reason, seeing we have power to compel men to yeeld to us? And men who can do least by Reason and Scripture, are many times strongest in their violence this way, this strength must come in to make up their other weakness. But it may be Conscience will not let them compell men presently; it will tell them they must seek first to convince men; but because the seeking to satisifie other mens consciences in things differing from us, is a troublesome work, the temptation that this principle presents, may at least prevail thus far, that seeing besides means of conviction by arguing they have another help at hand to keep down error, namely, compulsory violence, making men who differ from them, to suffer for those things; therefore not to trouble themselves very much in the way of seeking to convince, but for their owne ease to rid their hands of such a burthen some work, to cast the trouble, and lay heavy burdens upon their brethren, this is easie for them to do, though hard for their brethren to suffer; But the Tables may turn one day, wherein the sufferers shall have the greatest ease, & the inflicters the forest burthen. But God forbid that their brethren should lay it upon them, though it were put into their power to do it.

The temptation to pride is not less, neither are mens hearts lesse prone to this. If it prevails, what domineering is there like to be of one over another, yea of some few over many? If they judg in things never so doubtful, all must yeeld, at least for their profession and practice. This is a great power to be given to men over men in matters of faith and godliness. This is Lording it over Gods inheritance. It is observable, when the Church was in the lowest condition, this power was highest; the power of making Canons in doubtful things to bind under penalties: And when this power was lowest, as in the Primitive times, then the Church was highest.

Seventhly, This will be a means to bring grosse ignorance upon the face of the Churches & of the world: For, first, if men shall not be suffered to profess or practice otherwise then Governors in Church or State shall determine, they will not take pains to find out the truth themselves, but rather take things implicitly, with is the easiest way; they will think it to little purpose to take pains in examining things, when after all all is done, they must be bound up at least in their profession and practice, to what either is or shall be determined by those who have power of rule in their hands.

Our late Prelates designde was to bring in ignorance, that they might with the more freedom rule over us as they pleased; and in nothing did they drive on this design more, than in the practice of this power, which they took to themselves to command things doubtful and controversall, and by violence to urge their commands upon people: by which, had their power continued, gross ignorance would soon have bin spread over the face of the land. From whence hath come the gross ignorance of Popery, but from the prevailing of this principle? By which the people have been brought in such subjection under their guides, that they have lost their understandings in the matters of Religion.

If it be said, But wee will take care that those men who shall be consulted withal, and those men who shall have power in their hands to determine, shall be wise, understanding, godly men, and then the danger will not be so great.

Suppose those men who for the present have such power, have attained to the highest measure of knowledge and godliness that can be imagined to be in any men upon the earth, yet the people are under this temptation, to neglect the getting of knowledge themselves; and it may be the rather, because those who are appointed to determine things, are so understanding and so conscientious; now these people growing ignorant, when these knowing and godly men who are now in place, shall be gone, who shall choose other in their places? I suppose it to be the opinion of most of you, and of the godly in the Kingdom, and in all Reformed Churches, that either the body of the Church, the people must choose their Officers, or at least, that none must be put upon them without their consent. Well then, if the people through the prevailing of the former temptations grow ignorant, is it not like they will chuse such guiders and leaders as themselves are? or if they shall not chuse, yet their negative voice will have such an influence in the choice, as it is very probable, that in a generation or two, blind guiders will be brought in, and so the blind leading the blind. And when by this ignorance hath prevailed prevailed and gotten head in the Church, there is almost an impossibility ever to get it out again; this brings men into the dark, and locks and bolts the doors upon them.

Hence men by pleading for this principle, may bring themselves and their posterity into greater bondage then they are aware; for although now while they have the power in their own hands, it may be well with them; yet hereafter others may have the power, and then it may prove ill enough; they may then complain of what they now plead for; though now the guides of the Church may be good and holy, yet they may live to see such a change, or at least their posterity, that such a principle acted by such men as they may be under, may wring them; yea, it is the more strange, that men should plead so much for this now, when as the sores of their neckes, caused by the bondage under it a while since, are scarce yet healed.

Eighthly, there is yet another danger in this, not only that men will neglect truth, but there will be a strong temptation to resist and reject truth; if God begins to dart in any light into a mans spirit, that appears to crosse what hath been determined of for opinion or practice under a penalty; the corruption of a mans heart will entice him to turne his minde from that light, not to let it into conscience or heart, left it prevailing, should put him upon such ways wherein he is like to suffer. This hath been common in former times; many have hid their eyes from those truths that would have kept them from conformity, because they fore-saw what sad consequences would follow, if their consciences should not suffer them to conform.

But you will say: This supposes that some things will be urged that is contrary to truth, which is uncharitable to suppose.

Although in matters fundamentall, there is no feare that godly able men wil erre, yet let charity be stretched to the full latitude of it, and reverence of men in place raised to the uttermost height; yet if they will meddle with such things as are doubtful and controverfal amongst godly and peaceable men, and force them upon others; that confidence of theirs that shall put them out of feare of erring, shall be to me a ground of great fear, that they will erre.
But some will acknowledge, that some liberty should be granted in things thus doubtfull and controversall, to men who are indeed conscientious, godly and peaceable men; but if this be yeelded too, then men who are not conscientious, but of turbulent and corrupt spirits, will abuse it.

We have given rules to find out those who only pretend conscience, and if by those, or the like, it does not appeare, but that men are indeed conscientious in their way, we should judg charitably of them; you think much if those be not admiited to communion with Christ and his Saints, when they professe godliness in word and life, and nothing appears to the contrary; why then should you think much to tolerate those as conscientious, who professe it in words and life, and nothing appears to the contrary.

Bishop Davenant in that exhortation to peace before quoted, as one means for peace, gives his opinion thus, Because it belongs only to God to teach the hearts of men, it is our duty always to make the best interpretation of things, and to presume of every one where the contrary appears not by manifest signes, that bee is kept from assenting by his conscience rather then by obstinacy.

As for the peaceablenesse of mens dispositions, let it be judged from their carriages in other things of as great moment, wherein the temptation for the attaining their owne ends is as great, yea far greater then here: Do they not carry themselves in as peaceable, gentle, self-denying way as any? Mr. Parker upon the Croffe, cap. 5. sect. 14. pleads for himself and others, who could not yeeld in some things enjoyed them, when they were accused of pride, contempt, unpeaceablenesse; What signes, sayes he, doe men see in us of pride, contempt, unpeaceablenesse? What be our caetera opera, that bewray such a humor? Let it be named wherein we go not two mile, where we are commanded to goe but one, yea, whether we goe not as many miles as any booe of the preparation of the Gospel of peace will carry us: What payment, what paine, what labour, what taxation made us ever to murmure? Survey our charges where we have laboured, if they be not found to be of the faithfulllest Subjects that be in the land, Wee deserve no favour; nay, there is wherein we stretch our consciences to the uttermost to conforme and obey in divers matters: Are we refractory then other things? As Balaams Ass said to his Master, Have I used to serve thee so at other times?

And whereas it is said, that some will abuse such liberty as this: It is answered, Surely those who are peaceable and conscientious, must not be deprived of what sufferance Christ allows them, because others who are in the same way, are, or may prove turbulent, and do or may not appear truly conscientious. This is as farre beneath the rule of Justice, as no sufferance in any thing conceived erroneous, is above it.

Thirdly, whatsoever errors or miscarriages in Religion the Church should bear withall in men, continuing them still in communion with them as Brethren, these the Magistrate should bear with in men, continuing them in the Kingdom or Common-wealth, in the enjoyment of the liberty of Subjects: Grant what possible can be granted to the Magistrate in the extent of his power about Religion, to be Custos urinæst tabula; yet certainly no man can imagine, that this his charge reaches further then the charge of the Church: That he is to be more exact in his oversight of these things, then the Church is to be; for what ever the power of the Magistrate be in these things, yet to the Church especially are the Oracles, the Ordinances, the Truths of God committed. The charge of the spirituall estate of men especially belongs to the Church: Now the Church is to beare with men in their infirmities, though they be ignorant of many things, yea after means used for information. No Church must cast off any from communion with it, but for such things that all the Churches of Christ ought to cast them off for. This is generally held by our Brethren, if a man be rightly cast out of communion with one Church, he is thereby cast out of all; if this be so, then surely many things must be suffered before we proceed to cast out a member; it must not be for every error or miscarriage. Thus Bishop Davenant in his rules for Peace, Those may not be cut off from communion with particular Churches who remaine joyned to the Catholique Church.
From what hath been said these 2. consequences are clear: First, Articles or rules for doctrine or practice in matters of Religion to be imposed upon men, should be as few as may be; there is a very great danger in the unnecessary multiplying them: This in all ages hath caused divisions, and exceeding disturbances in the Churches of Christ.

I finde an excellent passage in an Epistle of Isaac Causbon to Cardinal Perron, which hee wrote in the name of King James by his command, (c) : The King ( faith he ) thinks that the things that are absolutely necessary to salvation are not many, therefore His Majesty is of that mind that there is no shorter way for peace, then first by severing necessary things from things that are not necessary, and then to labour a full agreement in those; but as for things not necessary, let them ( saies he ) be left to Christian liberty. And againe, These necessary things are few, and the King thinks this distinction to be of so great moment to lessen the controversies which this day doe so exceedingly trouble the Church, that all who study peace, should most diligently explicate, teach, and urge this.

(c) Rex arbitrar. tur rerum absolu- tate necessaria- ri um ad salutem non magnum esse numerum, quare extimant ejus majestas nullam ad in- tundam concor- diam, breviorem viam fore, quam si diligenter separarentur necessaria a non necessariis, ut de nece- ssariis conventut omnis opera innumerabund ut in non necessariis libertatis Christianae locus detur, paxca sum ipsis necessaria, arque illam distinctionem sereniss. Rex tanti putat esse momenti ad immuno- dantes controversias, quae hodie ecclesiam, timore exercente, ut omnium pacis studio forum judicet officium esse diligentissime habe explicate, docere, urgere.
God hath so graciously ordered things for the body, that things necessary for life are not many, nor costly; the greatest stir in the world is about things not necessary. So for the soule.

A second consequence from what hath been said, is, we see hence who is most for peace; one professeth what he is convinced of to be a truth and a duty, if it be not necessary, he is not to force it upon his Brethren, though he had never so much power in the Church or State to back him. The other holds this principle, That whatsoever he thinks to be a duty, he must force it upon his brethren, not only by the power of the Church, but he must call in the power of the Magistrate to back him in it.

But do not men in a Congregational way urge upon others their owne conceptions and practices, according to the power they have, as much as any, for if men will not enter into covenant, if they hold another kind of government in the Church differing from them, they will not receive them, nor communicate with them.

I would all our controversy lay here, surely we should soon agree. Whosoever doth as you say, cannot be justified in so doing; some men it may be through an earnest desire of promoting what they conceived to be the mind of Christ, have been too rigid in their dealings with their Brethren. What hath been said, will shew the evill of their practice as well as of others.

As for entering into Covenant, It is true, there is such a practice in the Congregational Churches, and a Covenant either explicite or implicite, I think all acknowledg: that is, there must be some agreement to joyne those together in a body, who formerly were not joyned, to make them to be of such a society, to have power in it with others for the choice of Officers in this Congregation, and to be under the care & charge of those Officers more then Members of another congregation: what shall joyn them, if not at least some mutual agreement to joyn in one body for such spirituall ends as Christ hath appointed this body for, the very nature of a society that is embodied, carries this with it; and any farther then this I know none requires as necessary.
Heart-divisions

Indeed the more explicite this agreement is, the more is the edification. Surely there is no Christian but will acknowledge that the more one Christian opens his heart to another, and binds himself to walk in the ways of Christ with another, the more comfortable it is, and helps to edification: and upon this ground doe the Congregational Churches practice this.

Suppose any godly man shall come and desire to joyn with any of them, but wchall tell them, that for his part he yet cannot be convinced by any thing he can find in Scripture that this way of covenanting is required; if the Church cannot satisfie such a man (being godly) in their practice, yet desire to know of him whether he be willing to joyn with them in all the ordinances of Christ, so farre as he knows, a meere affirmative to this is a covenant sufficient to joyn him with them. The more fully he expresseth this to them, it would be the more acceptable. Now then why is it that there is such a noise every where in exclamations against Church-covenant, when it is nothing but this, which how any gracious heart upon due consideration can be against, I cannot see.

And this is not only our present opinion, but that which ever since we knew any thing in that way, upon all occasions, we have held forth.

But what do you say to the other; If a man who you believe is godly, yet not being convinced of your way of Government, but rather thinks the Presbyteriall Government to be the way of Christ, would you receive such a man into communion with you?

If any godly man whose conscience is not satisfied in that way of Government, yet is so cast by Providence as he cannot joyn with those Churches where there is that Government he thinks to be Christs; and because hee is desirous to enjoy what ordinances of Christ he can, therefore tenders himself to one of these Congregational Churches: Such a man should be received to these Ordinances he sees to be Christs, if there be nothing else against him, but meerly because after all due means, yet through weaknesse he cannot see Christs minde in some other ordinance. Christ doth not lay so much upon the ordinance of Government, as to exclude all his Saints all their their days from all other Church-ordinances; if through weakness they cannot be convinced of that.

Now let one who is in a Congregational way, and cannot see Christ's mind in the Presbyterial Government, yet come to one of those Churches, and say, he would gladly in all his ways see the mind of Christ, and enjoy all his ordinances, but he cannot see that a Minister who takes only the charge to feed by Word and Sacraments one Congregation, yet should with others have the charge of ruling an hundred or more; and till he be convinced otherwise, he cannot in his practice acknowledge that Government to be Christ's, would you yet receive such a one to communion with you in all other Church-ordinances? If you would, I make no question then but if we well understood one another, and were of quiet spirits, we might live together in peace.

Let not miscarriages in particular men or Churches in things of this nature, hinder our peace; what we say ought to be suffered in us, we profess to be our duty to suffer that or any thing of the like nature in others: and where there hath not been that brotherly and Christian forbearance as ought to be, there hath been sinne committed against Christ: but let not this hinder brotherly and Christian agreement amongst our selves, or any other Churches of Christ.

4. Evills that are small or uncertain, or come by accident, must rather be suffered, then any good that is great, certain, and perhaps, should be hindered. We must take heed that in our zeal to oppose evill, we hinder not a greater good: If opposition of evill lies so far out of your reach as you cannot come at it but by hindering much good, you must be content then to let it alone.

Lastly, if the evils be such as only can be removed by supernatural means, we must not use violence for the removing of them, though God hath such authority over us, as he may justly punish us for not doing that which we are unable to do by the strength of nature; yet one man hath no such authority over another.

The power that God hath given a Magistrate, is but a natural help at the most, & therefore it can go no farther then to help us in a natural way, to do what we are able to do by a natural power; when it hath gone so far, there it must rest.

I shall refer the Learned to Zanchy upon the fourth Comment, where they may see more about this.

CHAP. X.

The fourth dividing Principle, Division is the best way to maintaine Dominion.

This is Machiavel's principle, Divide & regna. When Division is got into such a Principle as hath not only in the bowels of it, that is something to foment it by what may be drawn from it; but when the principle carries division in the very face of it, not collaterally, or by consequent avowing it, but directly & immediately justifying it, then it grows strong indeed, who can stand before it? When this is brought down to the people, it is expressed by that Proverbiall speech, It is good fishing in troubled waters. The divisions of the times are our advantages. Some mens ends are best serv'd, when church and State are most divided. They never had such comings in as now they have. It is true, it may be desired that men invil things should not agree, that they may be like the witnesses that came against Christ, who could not agree in their testimony. Paul cast a bone of dissension between the Pharisees and Sadduces.

But when men love division, and desire the continuance of
1. it; First, to maintain that which is evil; Secondly, to aime
2. at their owne ends, not regarding what publike mischieses come, so their own private advantages may be serv'd; not caring what house be on fire, so their eggs may be rost'd, if they may have some poor, pedling, private benefit by them.
3. ly. Not caring what the divisions are, whether against good, or against evil, so be it their turn may be serv'd: This is abominable, and cursed is that man that wishes for, or rejoyces in, or seeks the continuance of divisions, for these base ends. Yea that man is not worthy to breath in so good a Land as England is, who would not willingly lay downe his

his life to cure the present divisions and distractions that are amongst us, who would not desire with Nazianzen, as formerly Nonab, to be cast into the Sea himself, to be it all might be calm in the Publique? Oh cruel, hard-hearted man, who for his own private advantage is not sensible of the woful miseries of Church and State, yea of that dreadful dishonour to the name of God, caused this day by our sad divisions, miserable distractions! just it were that such a man should be separated to evil, and that his name should be blotted out from under heaven.

But if things were settled in Church and State, some men should not have such liberties as now they have, therefore they are willing enough to have our differences continued, their plot is to lengthen them out.

First, That which thou callest seeking to lengthen out divisions, it may be God now accounts, and will another day call seeking after the nearest union with himselfe, and the firmest union of his Saints.

Secondly, the liberties these men seek for, are either evil or good; if evil, oh how dearly do they buy that which is evil, with bringing the guilt of all that evil that comes from our divisions upon themselves; you need not wish any enemy more evil upon his head then this; certainly such a man hath load enough upon him.

But if those liberties they seek be good, or but supposed by them to be so, why then should they fear a right setting of things? what ever is good, can be no enemy unto good. That Scripture, Rom. 13. 3. is enough to keep their hearts from fearing the right ordered power of authority, especially from fearing it so farre, as by the fear of it, to be driven into such a desperate guilt of wickedness as this is, to desire or endeavour the continuance of such publique mischief for their own ends. Rulers, faith the Text, are not a terror to good works, but to evil; wilt thou then not be afraid of their power? doe that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same. Surely then the power was as formidable to any thing a christian heart could suppose good, as now any power is like to be that we have to deal with.

Thirdly, it is a sign of a very poor, low, unworthy spirit, to think that any in whom thou hast any persuasion there is any seare of God, or interest in Christ, should have no higher thoughts for their support and encouragement in what they conceive good according to the mind of Christ, but such as the hopes or desires of continuance of such wofull evils in the divisions of Church and State raiseth in them, if they did believe that Christ took no more care of them then so, but left them to such miserable supports as these are, their condition were sad indeed.

4v. If such baseness of spirit as this is, were ruling in them, which hath in it the malignity of all the dregs of an evil spirit, surely you would find it working in them in some other thing, save only in that wherein they differ from you.
For certainly it is impossible but that man that is so left of God to such dregs of evil, must needs break out to some other vile evils in a little time. It were strange if such horrid wickednesse of a mans heart should break out in nothing else.
The Lord therefore be Judg between his servants and those men, yea those men professing godliness, who have such hard thoughts of them; and the Lord convince them of all their hard speeches, and hard writings in this thing.

CHAP. XI.

The fifth dividing Principle. That every man is bound to profeffe and practice always what he apprehends to be truth.

This hath the greater strength, because it comes under a shew of exact godliness: I do not mean an hypocriticall shew, but an appearance to mens consciences.

It is very dividing: For, first, if while many things lye in mens owne thoughts, they cause much strife within themselves; their reasonings are very divers: Though they have all the same tincture from the same affections, and are swayed by the same ends then when these things come abroad, before others, who have not the same reasonings, nor the same affections, to give them such a tincture, but reasonings and affections running quite another way, nor the same ends to fway them; but quite different to poyse them a crose way, there must needs be much strife, such divisions as will be hard to reconcile. If men sometimes can hardly prevail with their own thoughts to agree, notwithstanding the fway of their own affections and ends; how are they like to agree with others, whose affections and ends are so various from theirs.

Secondly, if men doe presently professe and practice what they conceive to be right, they must necessarily professe and recant, recant and professe; for in many things, what they apprehend to be true at one time, they suspect, yea see cause to deny at another; and what confusion & disorder would there be in matters of Religion, if continually by some or other there should be profession of things as true and good, and calling the same things presently into question, yea within a while denying and renouncing them? And if not so, then

3. If a man hath once made profession of what he conceives to be a truth, differing from others, if it proves to be a mis-apprehension, there lies a great temptation upon him to stand out in it, to strive to make it out to the utmost; for nothing is more contrary to a man's nature, then to acknowledg himself to be mistaken in his understanding, and to lyeedown in the shame of rashnesse and inconsideratenesse in his actions; therefore whatsoever mens own thoughts be within, in their own spirits, they had need take heed what they doe, when they come to make open profession, and practice what they apprehend, and engage themselves thereby to maintaine; there are not many who attaine to Augustines self denyall, to publish retractions to all the world. Now if a man through the strength of this temptation, shall still retaine what he hath made profession of, and others shall see his weakenesse, joyned with wilfulness; they must oppose him in it, and so contention and division is like to rise higher and higher. In regard therefore of the great usefulness of this point, and the difficulty of the right understanding it, I shall endeavour to speak to it under these three Heads.

First, to shew wherein Profession is necessary.

Secondly, wherein men may keep in, what they think they understand to be truth, so as not to professe or practice it.

Thirdly, I shall propound some rules of Direction, to shew in what manner a man should make profession of what he conceives to be truth, though it be different from his Brethren.

For the first. Certainly profession in some things is very necessary.

Rom. 10. 10. With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. Confession is here joined to believing, as necessary to salvation. This I conceive to be the meaning of those places which hold forth the necessity of Baptisma. He that believes and is baptized, shall be saved. Augustine in one of his Sermons De Tempore, says, Wee cannot be saved, except wee profess our faith outwardly for the salvation of others. And Christ, Mar. 8. 38. says, Whosoever shall be ashamed of him and of his words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Sonne of Man be ashamed, when he comes in the glory of his Father with his holy Angels. And it is observable, that they follow upon those places, What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soule? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soule? As if Christ should say, If you would not lose your soules eternally, look to this, make profession of the truth, as you are called to it; though you live in a wicked and an adulterous generation, yet be not ashamed of me before them; for if you be, your souls may goe for it eternally.

Zuingerius in his third Epistle, says, We may as well with a Docalian worship before the Altar of Jupiter and Venus, as conceal our faith under the power of Antichrist.

Now though profession be necessary, yet in what cases we are bound to profess, and in what not, is no easy matter to determine.

Zuarez, a man of great judgement, yet falling upon this Question, When a man is bound to make profession of the Truth, says, Wee cannot give rules in particular, when there is a necessity of profession, in regard of the good of our neighbour, but it must bee determined by the judgment of Prudence.

But though the determination be very difficult, yet we may affer three or five cases to bind us to profession.
First, when the truths are necessary to salvation, and my forbearance in them may endanger the salvation of any, the salvation of the soul of the pooreft beggar, is to be preferred before the glory, pomp, outward peace and comforts of all the Kingdoms on the earth; therefore much before my private contentments: In extream danger of life there is no time to reason what in prudence is fit to be done, but save the mans life if you can, and reason the case afterward.

Secondly, when not profession shall be interpreted to be a denyall, though in case of a lesser truth; I must not deny the truth, the leaft truth interpretative, I must rather be willing to suffer, then the truth should suffer by me so farre: This was Daniel's case, when he would not ceafe his praying three times a day, neither would he shut his windows, though it endangered his life. A carnall heart would say, why might not Daniel have been wiser? he might have forborn a while, at leaft he might have shut his windows. No, Daniel was willing to venture his life in the cause, rather then he would so much as by way of interpretation, deny that honour that he knew was due to God.

Thirdly, when others shall be scandaliz'd, so as to be weakened in their faith by my denyall; yea, so scandalized as to be in danger to sin, because they see me not to profeffe; in this case we must venture very far, we should take heed of offending any of the Saints, so as to grieve them, but when the offence comes to weaken their faith to occasion their sin, there we should venture very far to our own outward prejudice, rather then so to offend them.

Fourthly, when an account of my faith is demanded, if it be not either in scorn to deride, or in malice to ensnare, but seriously, so as the giving it may be to edification, especially in a way of giving a publique testimony to the truth, 1 Pet. 3, 15. Be ready to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you. If to every one, much more to Magistrates.

Fifthly, so far as those whom God hath committed to my charge for inftiuation are capable, at some time or other I must manifest that truth of God to them that may be for their good according as I am able.

Yet
Yet this duty of profession being a duty required by an affirmative precept, though we are bound always, yet not to all times, semper, but not ad semper, we must always keep such a disposition of heart, as to be in a readiness, rather to give testimony to any truth of God, if called to it by God, then to provide for our ease or any outward comfort in this world, so as we may be able to appeal to God in the sincerity of our hearts, to judge of that high esteem we have of his truth. Lord if thou shalt make known to me now or any other time, that thy Name may have any glory by my profession, of any truth of thine, whatsoever become of my outward peace, ease, or content, I am ready to do it for thy Names sake. There is a time, says Hugo, when nothing is to be spoken, a time when something, but there is no time when all things are to be spoken.

There are six other cases wherein you are not bound to profess.

First, when you shall be required in way of scorn, or to ensnare you; this were to cast pearls before swine.

6. You are not bound to make profession of a truth to those who are not able to receive it, whose weakness is such, as they cannot understand it till they be principled with some other truths. I have many things to say, says Christ, but ye are not able to hear them. So St. Paul, Hast thou faith? have it to thy selfe; he speaks in the case of doubtfull things, which will trouble weak ones.

7. When mens hearts appear so corrupt, that there is apparent danger of abuse of truths, to the strengthening them in their lusts, there are precious truths that many Ministers cannot speak of before people without trembling hearts; and were it not that they believed they were the portion of some foules in the Congregation, they dared not mention them.

8. When your profession of some truths will take off mens hearts from other that are more weighty and necessary. The rule of the Apostle, Rom. 14. 1. holds forth this; Receive not those men who are weak in faith to doubtfull disputations; this may hinder them in the great things of the Kingdom of God, Righteousnesse, peace, joy in the holy Ghost; vers. 17. As if the Apostle should say, Let them be well established in them; but but these doubtfull disputations will hinder them in such things as these are.

Fiflty, when my profession at this time in this thing is like to hinder a more useful profession at another time in another thing. Prov. 29. 11. A foole uttereth all his mind, he that is wise keeps it in till afterward. It was the wisdome of Paul when he was at Athens, not presently to break out against their Idols, hee said his due time, and yet all the time hee kept in his uprightness in the hatred of Idolatry as much as ever.

Sixtly, when our profession will cause publick disturbance, and that to the godly, the disturbance of mens corruptions who will oppose out of malice, is not much to be regarded. When it was told Christ the Pharisees were offended, he cared not for it, but he made a great matter of the offence of any of his little ones. When men who love the truth as well as wee, shall not only be against what we conceive truth, but shall be offended, and that generally at it; if we have discharged our own consciences by declaring as we are called to it what we conceive the mind of God, we should sit down quietly, and not continue in a way of publique offence and disturbance to the Saints. The rule of the Apostle will come in here, Let the spirit of the Prophets be subject to the Prophets: wee should wait till God will some other way, or at some other time have that prevale in their hearts and consciences of his people which we conceive to be truth, and they are now so much offended at. There could never be peace continued in the Church, if every man must continually, upon all occasions, have liberty openly to make profession of what he apprehends to be a truth; never have done with it, though the Church, which is faithfull, and desires unfeignedly to honour Christ and his truth, be never so much against it.

In divers of these cases the consideration of that Text, Eccl. 7. 16. is very sutable; Be not righteous over much, neither make thy selfe over wise, why shouldst thou destroy thy selfe? Amongst other things this is included in the scope of the Holy Ghost; when you apprehend a thing to be a truth, do not think that you are bound all times, upon all occasions, to the utmost profession, practise, promote that truth, without any consideration.
tion of others, being carried on with this apprehension, it is a truth, come of it what will; whatsoever becomes of me, whatsoever trouble shall follow upon it, I must and will pro-fesse it; and publish it again and again to the death: In this you had need look to your spirit, in this you may be over-just, and make your self over-wise; though there may be some uprightnesse in your heart, some love to Christ and his truth, yet there may be mixture of your own spirit also; you may stretch beyond the rule; this is to be over-righteous, to think out of a zeal to God and his truth, so goe beyond what God requires.

It is true, at no time, upon no occasion, though thy life, and all the lives in the world lay upon it, thou must not deny any the least truth, but there may be a time when God doth not require of thee to make profession of every thing thou believe-west to be a truth.

You will say, This tends to looseness, to lukewarmness, to time-serving; men pretending and pleading discretion, grow loose and remisse, and so by degrees fall off from the truth.

Vers. 17. Let men take heed of that too: Be not over-much wicked, neither be thou foolish. As you must be careful not to goe beyond the rule, so take heed you fall not off from it; so you may grow wicked and foolish, yea very wicked, over-wicked, God will meet with you there too: Wherefore vers. 18. It is good thou shouldst take bold of this, yea also from this withdraw not thine hand: Take both, be careful of thy self in both, but especially mark the last clause of the 18. vers. He that fearreth God shall come forth of them all. The feare of God possessing thy heart, will help thee in these straits; thou shalt by it be delivered from being ensnared by thy indiscreet, sinfull zeal, and it shall likewise keep thee from bringing misery upon thy selfe, by falling as farre on the other hand, to looseness and time-serving. The fear of God will ballast thy soul even, it will carry thee on in a way that shall be good in the eyes of the Lord, and of his Saints.

There is a natural boldnes, and a mixed zeal in many who are godly, that carries them on in those ways that cause great disturbance to others, and brings themselves into great straits and snares; and these men are very ready to confuere others of remissesse neffe and loosenesse, who do not as themselves do; but this Scripture reproves them, shewing that it is not through fleshly wisdome, and providing for case that is the cause others do not as they do, but the fear of God in a right way ballasting their spirits; God will own his fear to be in their hearts, ordering them aright, when thy disorderly, mixed zeal shall receive rebuke from Christ.

But doth not Christ say, Hee came into the world to witnesse to the truth, and is not every truth more worth then our lives?

That man who in the former five cases wherein profession is shewed to be our duty, shall witness to the truth, shewes that truth is indeed precious to him, and gives that testimony to the truth, that he was born for, although in the six latter he shall forbear.

But when these latter cases shall fall out, how shall the truth be maintained? will it not suffer much prejudice?

1. Christ will not be beholding to mens weaknesses for the maintenance of his truth.

2. If every man according to his place to deliver his own soule, shall declare (observing the rules we shall speak to presently) what he conceives to be the mind of God, though he shall not either in words or practice continually hold forth the same, yet thereby the truth is maintained.

3. The truth is maintained, by forbearing that practice which those opinions of men that are contrary to the truth, puts them upon, not doing as they do is a continual witnesse against them, and so a witnesse for the truth, & this is a Christians duty at all times, although I must never upon any ground do that which my conscience says is in it selfe sin, in the least thing, yet I am not ever bound to do that which my conscience says is in it selfe good (as it may fall out) in some great things. A thing in it selfe ill can never be made my duty to do, what ever circumstances it may be cloathed with, whatever good I conceive may be done by it; but a thing in it selfe good, may by circumstances attending of it, be such, as at this time it is my duty to forbear it, so that in not doing it I cannot be charged of a sin of omission, of not living according to what my judgment and conscience is convinced of to be truth, and good.
Five rules for the ordering our profession of truth.

1. That we may understand yet further our duty of profession so as we may cause no divisions by it, let these five rules be considered for the ordering of it.

First, we must be well grounded in fundamentals, before we make profession of other truths; seldom or never have you known men who in the beginning of their profession of Religion have laid out the first of their strength in Controversies, but that they have vanished & come to nothing in their profession. Be it well rooted in the faith; in the great things of godliness, the absolute necessary things of eternal life, and then thy searching into other truths of God which are for thy further edification, will be reasonable.

2. Take heed that what thou dost be not out of affection of novelties, which men naturally have itching desires after. It is very pleasing to the flesh, to convey such things to others, to be the first that shall bring to others, things which before they understood not, whatsoever the things be. As there is much wickedness in raising up old errors, as if they were new truths; so there is much vanity in bringing forth old truths in novel and affected phrases, as if men desired to be thought to find out some new thing that yet hath not been, or is very little known in the world, when indeed upon examination, when it is unclad of its new expressions, it proves to be the same old truth, that ordinarily hath been known & taught, and so the man appears to be no knowing man, more then ordinary. Take heed of this vanity of spirit in the holding forth of truth, especially when in publick you speak of God's truths, speak of them with reverence of the name of the great God, as the Oracles of God, clearly, plainly, not in obscure, uncouth, unknown expressions, as the Oracles of the Idols were wont to be delivered in.

3. Whatsoever is differing from others who are godly, is not to be held forth and professed without serious examination; we may venture more suddenly upon those things which are generally received of the Saints; but if they be differing, then we had need examine them over and over again, with a jealous eye over our own hearts, and to take heed to our spirits, & how we behave our selves in such things wherein we are like to go away so much differing from so many of our godly, godly, able brethren. Wee must take heed of publishing any such things rawly, undigestedly, lest we wrong the truth of God, and make the profession of it become ridiculous. If the thing be true to day, it will be true to morrow.

4. We must not think it enough boldly to assert things, but according to the rule of the Apostle, 1 Pet. 3. 15. we must give an account, 1. with meekness; we must not do it in a passionate, froward way, not with our affections hurrying and tumultuous; not after a contentious manner, as if we desired victory rather then truth; but with quietness and composednesse of spirit. We must not think it much to bear contradiction from others, yea though it should arise to contemptuous carriage against us, and with fear, that is, either in respect of our selves who make the profession, or in respect of those before whom we make it. For our selves, we must not do it in a conceited way, not in a high, arrogant way, with foolish confidence in our selves, in our own apprehensions and abilities, but with feare, manifesting our sensibleness of our own weakness, vanity, and nothinges: 2. In respect of those before whom the profession is made. We must manifest our due, reverent esteem of them; no unbecoming behaviour, no scornfulness, lightness, contempt, if it before Magistrates, especially then whatever they are in regard of their persons, yet reverentiall respects ought to be given to them in respect of their places; and if they be men of worth, learning, graces, publike use in the Church or State, that respect that is due to their worth, is to be manifested also in our carriage towards them. Grace teacheth no man to be unmannerly, rude, scornfull, furious, or foolish.

5. If you would make profession or practice any thing differing from others who are godly and judicious, you should first acquaint those who are most able, with what you intend, and not go to youths, & women, and weak ones first, seeking to promote what you apprehend, by possessing your hearts first with it, and to get them to be a party for you; this is not the way of God. If God hath revealed some new thing to you, you have some new light that is not yet made known to your Brethren, which not only by profane men, but I fear by some who are godly, is in a profane manner scorned at; and it were well wel it none of those who pretend it, did not give some occasion: were not the temptation to the despising of that expression, yet you should first goe to those who are most able to judge, acquaint them with what apprehensions you have, and see whether they cannot make it appeare to you that you are mistaken; if not, they may confirm you in the truth, that you may go on in it with the more confidence.

If Churches were setled as they ought, I should think it very ill for any Minister to preach any thing not ordinarily received by the Saints, before they have acquainted other Elders, yea some of other Churches with it, if out of an eager desire to be formost in venting some new thing, they shall do it meerly from themselves, they may be meanes to raise and engage themselves in woeful disturbances before they are aware. That common union and fellowship that there is between Elders and Churches, requires mutual advise and consultation in matters of difficulty, though to lay a law upon them to advise in everything, be it never so clear, would be hard.

CHAP. XII.
The sixth dividing Principle. What is in it selfe best must be chosen and done, not weighing circumstances, or references.

This brings much trouble to the Churches; yea it causeth much trouble in the spirits and lives of many truly godly. It causeth men to break the bonds of their Callings, of their Relations, of their publique Interests, therefore certainly it must needs be a dividing Principle.

Some men whose calling is only to a private employment, yet having some gifts, and having used sometimes in their Families to take a Scripture, and speak something out of it; upon this they think it is a better thing to be exercised in preaching Gods word, than to sit in a shop all day, at some meane worke, or selling our wares; therefore they thinke they are bound to give over their Callings, which they look at as too low, mean things, and be Preachers of the Word, not regarding those due ways that Christ would have men come into such an employment by. Although I do not think, but that Tradesmen, Tradesmen, who have good knowledge in the Scripture, and are gifted by God to speak the Word to people for their edification, when there is a want of able men, who have been all their lives preparing for such a work, and are set apart for it, rather than people should continue in ignorance, and so perish (if those who are able and fit to judge, shall judge them meet for such a work) they may be employed to make Christ known to them; yet for every man that takes himself to be a gifted man, and it may be is so judged, by some who are willing to flatter him, to take upon him of himselfe, or by the advice of two or three of his friends, to leave his other employment for the work of the Ministry, because that is a more noble and excellent work; this is not a way of God, but a way of confusion and disorder.

Again, it is in itself a better thing to enjoy a Ministry of the most eminent gifts and graces, then one of lower; but if this should be made a rule, that a man who is under a Pastor, who is faithfull, and in some good measure gifted, upon another man coming into the Countrey that is more eminent, he should for sake his Pastor, and joyn to the other; and if after this still a more eminent man comes, he should leave the former and joyn to him; and by the same Law, a Pastor who hath a good people, yet if others be more likely to receive more good, he may leave his own people, and goe to them, what confusion and disorder would there be continually in the Church? Men must consider, not only what the thing is in its own nature, but what it is to them, how it stands in reference to their relations. If you be joyned to a Pastor, so as you believe he is set over you by Christ, to be a Pastor to you (not because the Bishop hath sent one, or an old Luther dyes, and leaves the Patronage of a living to some Offler or Tapwrench in an Alchouse, and he or she shall send one by virtue of their right to the patronage, this cannot tie a mans conscience to depend upon him for the ordinances of Christ all his days, in case he cannot remove his dwelling, but if you cannot but look upon the man as the Pastor that Christ hath set over you.) Though this man hath meaner gifts then others; and it would be more comfortable to you to have another Pastor; yet this is not enough to cause you to desist him whom Christ Christ hath set over you; and if people may not leave their Pastors, because others have more eminent gifts, then surely Pastors must not leave their people, because others have more eminent Livings.

To instance yet further, that you may see how this Principle disturbs mens spirits: Many being in the works of their calling, have some thoughts come into their mind, that prayer is a better work, more noble and spiritual, than to be employed as they are; therefore they must needs presently leave their works, and go to prayer. How many have been perplexed with temptations this way, by which their lives have been made very uncomfortable? Prayer in itself is better, but is it better at this time for me, all things considered? am not I about that with God hath called me to do? By this Principle many deceive and trouble themselves, in respect of their souls, as some by a conceit of the like nature, deceive & bring great trouble to themselves in respect of their bodies; some who have sickly bodies, their flesh is decayed, they think such and such things have most nourishment in them, such things are hot, and full of spirits, and juice, therefore they will eat and drink altogether such things, leaving their ordinary dyet; by this means they many times overthrow their bodies: for though a man wants flesh, yet the way for him to have it, it may be is not to take nourishing things, but purging; and though he be troubled with faintness, it may be the way to get good spirits, is by eating ordinary dyet, and cooling his body, that so some distemper may be cured, and he may get his veins filled with good blood, and spirits got from it, rather then by drinking hot waters that are full of spirits, which perhaps burns his heart, and dries his body, that there is no good blood generated from his dyet.

It is not enough therefore to say the thing is in itself better, but is it better in all the references I have, and it hath? is it better in regard of others, in regard of the publique, for the helping me in all my relations? May it not help one way, and hinder many ways? If a Physician should come to a man, and see his disease is hot, and should therefore presently cool him by giving him water, the man may like it for the present;
tent; why is it not better to be cool, then so burning hot? but thus the Physician discovers his folly, and the Patient loses his life. A Physician in prescribing some physic had need have forty considerations in his head at once, how one part stands affected to the other, of what years the man is, of what complexion, how long the disease hath been upon him, what was last done to him, &c. So it should be in the duties of Religion, a Christian who desires to walk orderly, to be virtuous and honour his profession to enjoy communion with God, & peace in his own soul, and be useful to the publique, had need have his wits about him, not presently to fall upon a work, because it is now presented as good to him in a single consideration; he must compare one thing with another, and see what it is in all its references; or otherwise he will but enterprize, he will but hack and hew, and bungle, and disturb himself and others in the ways of Religion, he will make Religion tiresome to himself and others, he will be in danger in time to call off strictness, and to grow so much the more loose then others, by how much more straitened he hath been in a disorderly way than others. I believe some of you have known those who in their young time have been very strict and tender; whatsoever they have conceived to be better then other, they have presently followed it with all eagerness, never considering circumstances, references, or consequences, but the thing is good, it must be done; yet being wearied with this, they have after grown loose, in so great an excess, the other way; yea, it may be have vanished and come to nothing.

CHAP. XIII.

The seventh Dividing Principle; It is obstinacy for a man not to be convinced by the judgement of many, more learned and godly then himself.

The making this to be the rule to judge obstinacy by, hath in all ages caused great divisions by exasperating the spirits of men one against another. In times of Popery what rage did:
did it raise against men who were most conscientious? the generality of men thought they did God good service, in persecuting those who would not yield to the judgment of others, who had the repute of learning and piety; and those who were conscientious, could not yield to their determinations, not seeing the truth of God in them, and this made the stir. While men appear obstinate, by the rule of Christ we are not to bear with them; and this Principle sets thousands of godly peaceable men in the seat of the obstinate, these cannot in conscience yield, and others cannot but in conscience oppose them; what reconciliation then can there be hoped? either men must captivate their consciences, cause them in a forc'd way to bow down to slavery, or else there must needs be continuall division and opposition where this prevailes.

I confess such a Principle as this is would make for union amongst those who either think they need not, or through carelessness regard not to sear out truth, but with an implicit faith take in all that shall be imposed upon them, who think ignorance of God's mind and conscience slavery, to be no great evil; this is never urged with violence, but either by those who have given up their consciences to be serviceable to the ease and content of the flesh, or those who have, or hope to have power in their hands, to bring others in subjection to them.

Because the right informing our judgments in this, may much conduce to peace, I shall endeavour, 1. To shew you what due respect is to be given to men's judgments who are learned and godly. 2. Yet not so much as to make their judgments the rule to judge men obstinate, if they differ from them. 3. What then should be the rule? by what should we judge a man to be obstinate?

For the first. Certainly much respect is to be given to the learning and godliness of men. There is a great delusion in many mens hearts, that makes them thinke it to be halfe Poperty, to give any respect to Learning; although the abuse of Learning hath done much evil, against that much hath been and may be said; but I dare avow this, that never since the be-inning of the world could a man be found to speak against Learning
Learning but an ignorant man; neither is it like, nay I may aver, it is impossible that any but such will be found to the end of the world: Learning hath so much of God in it, that it never had nor will have any enemy but ignorance.

1 Tim. 4. 13. Give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine. Ver. 15. Give thy selfe wholly to them, &c. with them. And when we see grace added to Learning, it should adde much to our esteem of such a man; it is the orient pearl in the gold ring, it is a great testimony to a way, that it is the way of good men. Prov. 2. 20. That thou maist walke in the way of good men, and keep the paths of the righteous. The judgement and counsell of such is to be received with very great respect, especially if the eminencie of their grace appears in the tenderness of their spirits, that we may see much of the feare of God in them. Ezra 10. 3. Now let us make a covenant, according to the counsell of my Lord, and of those that tremble at the commandement of our God. And when not only some godly men are of this mind, but when it is that which God hath sealed in the hearts of the Saints generally, very high respect is to be given unto it.

Wherefore he that differs in his judgment from wise, learned, godly men, had need

First, spend much time in Prayer and Humiliation before the Lord. There is a notable expression of Basil, cited in an Appendix of an Epistle of Luther to the Ministers of Norimberg, who were at variance one from another: He who will separate himselfe from his brethren, had need consider many things even to anxiety; he had need break his sleep many nights, and seeke of God with many teares, the demonstration of the truth.

2ly. You must even then when you cannot subject to their judgments, preserve due reverence in your heart, and shew due respect to men of learning and grace according to their worth. We have a notable relation of that holy man, Mr. Greenham, in a Letter of his to the Bishop of Ely, in whose Diocese he lived; the Bishop seeking to bring him to conformity, objected thus unto him, Why will not you yeeld? Luther approved of these things, are you wiser than he? His sober and gracious answer was, I reverence more the revealed will of God in teaching, than worthy instrument of God, Mr. Luther so many necessary nies, &c. cum multis lacrymis pereate a Deo veritatis dem-

onstrationem, qui se a fratris bis separate cult.
cessary things to salvation, then I search into his secret will, why bee kept backe from his knowledge other things of lesse importance.

3ly. If those things wherein we differ from the judgments of learned and godly men, be not matters of duty, they only may bring us to some suffering, we should silently yield for peace sake, and out of respect to them not oppose.

4ly. In all things wherein you may have any helpe from them, you should repair to them, and desire to partake of the benefits of those gifts and graces God hath bestowed upon them.

5ly. In all things wherein you can agree, you should be the more careful to manifest all possible observance and respect to them, in blessing God for any help he grants to you by them, either in making known his truth to you, or at least in further confirming you in it by them.

6ly. And in what all your consciences will not suffer you to agree with them, you are to take it as your affliction, and to account that way you are in to want a great luster, and most desirable encouragement, in that so many learned and godly mens judgments and practices are against it.

We are to raise our respects to men of learning and godliness thus high; but if we should go so high, as to give up our judgment and consciences to them, we should in honouring them, dishonour Christ, yea they would account themselves to be dishonored. Such as are truly godly and wise, do rather account it their honor to carry a loving respect to those who differ from them, then desire that men should, blindfold, before they see their grounds, follow them. Prelaticall spirits indeed account it their honour to force men to be of their mind; it is their glory that they can say to the consciences of men, Bow down before us. A gracious spirit abhors the thought of such a tyranny. This to high raising respects due to learned, holy men, hath been very hurtfull in the Church, prejudicial to the souls of men, but especially to the honour of Christ. I will give you an instance. Erasmus was no novice, yet how dangerously he was taken with this, will appear by a strange expression of his, in an Epistle hee wrote to one Bilibaldus: How far the authority of the Church prevails with others, I know.
I know not; but with mee it hath that power, that I could be of the opinion with Arrianis and Pelagians, if the Church did but allow that which they taught. This you will say is a strange expression, coming from a learned man, and one too, not addicted to the Church that then was in that excess as others were; how then did this conceit prevail with men more weak, who gave up their consciences to others through their blind superstition?

Wherefore secondly, though great respect is to be given to men holy and learned, yet not such, that a man must be judged obstinate, if hee submit not to their judgments and determinations. For, First, if a man should believe or do any thing before he sees some other grounds besides their judgments or examples, though the thing were in it selfe never so good, yet it would be sin to him. If indeed this were enough to answer Christ, Lord, I am a poore weak man, I cannot find out thy truths my selfe, therefore I seeing learned godly men to be of such a judgment, and doing such things, I thought it too much presumption for mee to differ from them, therefore I also believed it to be true, and practised accordingly. This were an easie way for people to agree, and it might well be judged obstinacy to gainsay. But this account Christ will not take, for he tells us, WHATSOEVER IS NOT OF FAITH, IS SINNE, and the judgments and practices of godly learned men, he never made to be the rule of faith.

2vy. If God in revealing his mind to men, alwayes did it according to the proportion of their gifts and graces, then it were too much boldnesse for any to differ from those who are most eminent; but experience tells us it is otherwise, as God causeth his rain to fall upon one field, and not upon another; and as the wind blows where it list, so are the workings of the Spirit of God upon men. Although hee reveals to all his Saints whatsoever is absolutely necessary to salvation, yet for other truths, a man of eminent parts shall know one, another of weaker shall know another. David was a man as eminent for parts, & was filled with the Spirit of God as much as Nathan, both in regard of Prophesie and godlinesse; yet sometimes that was revealed to Nathan, which was kept hid from David. When the Book of the Law was found, and read before Josiah, they tend to Huldah the Prophetesse, yet there were Prophets in the Land at that time.

But you will say, Is it not more likely that men of learning and piety, should know what is right, and what is not, better then others?

True, it is more likely they should; but God many times doth things which we think are not likely; that which is the most unlikely to us, God many times chooseth as best to serve his ends.

Thirdly, If there were no other reason why a man of weaker parts should differ from other, then because he is conceited of his parts, thinks himself more able to understand then those who are far his betters, then there would be more liberty to deal severely with him: But being there may be this reason, why men who are weak, yet differ from those who are eminent, Christ hath laid this charge upon them, that they must not believe or practice any thing in the matters of Religion, but what they shall see ground for out of his word. If a man shall be jealous of himself, fearing left his own understanding should mislead him; and in the use of all means he can, seeks to God, and yet cannot see from Scripture the ground of those things learned and godly men have determined, and having received such a charge from Christ not to alter his judgment or practice, till in the use of these means he should receive further light from him; what would you have this man do? If he yeelds to you, he sins against the charge of Christ and his own conscience; if he doth not, either now or after such a time you prefixe him, alter his judgment and practice, you judge him obstinate, and in the name of Christ deal with him as such; do not you by this make that bond that Christ hath laid upon him (to do all he doth from a principle of faith) heavier then Christ would have it.

Fourthly, the more learning, the more godliness men have, the more pains they take in finding out the truth; there is the lesser ground to judge those obstinate, who differ from them, because they differ.

You will say, How can that be? For if men be very learned and godly, and take much pains to finde out the truth, there is the more reason we should believe their judgements more then our owne.
We must indeed honour them, then, the more; but yet the exquisitenesse of their learning, the eminency of their godliness, the industry of their labours, for the finding out of truth, may excuse those from obstinacy who cannot see into the ground from the word, of all that they are able to see; for is it not more then probable, that men who are weak and excedingly beneath them, should through meer weakness be una-able to see the rule of Scripture in those things which they have got the light of, by the help of their great learning, god-liness, and indefatigable labours? Can it be, that men who have not attained to that eminencie, who are not able to take so much pains in searching, that they (though they have their help added) should be able to attain to what these men so eminent and industrious have attained to? Can they in a few months come to see that which they have been studying, and debating one with another divers years before they could see it, can they be satisfied in their consciences of the mind of Christ, when these eminent men, for a long time could hardly satisifie one another? yea, it may be after all the helpe of their learning, godliness, and painfull labours, they look upon many things but as probable, as more likely to be so then otherwise, they have not a Plerophory in their own hearts; and shall those who doe not see ground enough for the foot of Faith to settle upon, be judged, and dealt with as obstinate?
Because they yet are not of their mind, (God forbid.)
Fifthly, there is much danger in making this to be the rule; for if to go against the judgment of godly and learned men be obstinacy now, ere long it may come to this, that to goe against those in place, who have power in their hand, shall be obstinacy, whatsoever they be; for who dare question their learning and piety? Whatsoever miscarriages these shall be in after ages in bringing men unlearned & ungodly into place;
yet those must be judged as guilty of obstinacy who are not of the same judgment they shall be of, and into what a case then have we brought our selves.

If you shall say, True, our case would be sadde, but we must venture it, there is no helpe, better an inconveniencie then a mischief.

But here will be not an inconveniencie only but a mischies...
In civil things this indeed must be ventured, for there we are not bound to understand the reason and ground of all things; but if nothing appear to be contrary to the rules of justice and piety, we are to submit; but in the matters of Religion it is otherwise, we must understand the ground of all from the word; therefore those who shall lay down such a position, that we may deal with these men as obstinate, by the Ordinance of Christ, who after two or three admonitions shall not be of the same judgment, and do the same things that learned and godly men determine, do bring the Church into greater bondage then they are aware of.

6. Learned and godly men yet have flesh as well as spirit, & private engagements do often sway much even with them. Here with us we know how the greater number of learned and godly men goe, but in New England the greater number of learned and godly men goe another way. Lately the greater number of learned and godly men in old England did judge submission to Prelaticall power in the Church, and practice of Ceremonies, and use of Common-prayer to be lawfull, I hope it is not so now.

7. If it be always obstinacy not to believe or practise what they judge should be believed and practis'd, then sometimes it will be obstinacy not to believe and practise a contradiction; for we know some learned and godly men determine one thing, some determine the contrary; yea, sometimes they are contrary to themselves.

8. It is against the rule of the Apostle, Try all things, keep that which is good, abstain from all appearance of evil. If after the tryall of Prophecie, there be but an appearance of evil, we are not bound to abstain.

9. We know by our own experience, we have differed from many more learned and godly men, then our selves, and yet our consciences did excuse us before God, that we did it out of obstinacy, that if our lives had lain upon it, we could not for the present have helped it.

But if wee shall not judge men that goe against the determination of those who are most able to judge, then every man may do what seems good in his owne eyes, and so there will be nothing but confusion.

Not
The eighth dividing Principle. If others be against what wee conceive to be truth, wee may judge them going against their owne light.

This is a worse, a more dividing Principle then the former; it is worse to make our judgments the rule of other mens actions, then other mens judgements the rule of our actions: This makes men who differ, to have exceeding hard thoughts one of another, it causeth a mighty spirit to rise in them one against another. A man cannot judg worse of another, then this, that he goes against his owne light. Of all things conscientious men knows not how to bear this; yet how ordinarily will men who are weak, judg those that are strong, because they cannot see into the reasons of their actions: therefore those that do them, must needs do them against their own light: If they see another mans garb, and manner of converse, and way, to be differing from their owne, they presently judge him sinning against his own conscience, to be acted.
acted by by-ends to doe what he does meerly out of cunning and craftiness; This is from the pride and towneffe of mens spirits. This is farre enough for you to goe in judging your brother, were I in his condition, should I doe as hee doth, I should goe against my light, I should act by by-ends; but therefore to conclude that he goes against his light, and acts by by-ends, is very sinfull. Many carnall men thinke, if they should make such a shew of Religion; if they should doe such things as such and such men do, it would be hypocrisy in them, and they judge truly, because their Principle would not bære out their practice; but therefore to judge all that do such things to be hypocrites, we account to be a very wicked thing. If thou hadst any spirit of humility or wisdom in thee, thou wouldst rather thinke, it may be he sees what I do not, I am to look to mine own heart and ways, by what principles I goe my self: Men who are weake, and can see but a little way into things, must take heed they censure not others, who know how to manage busineses better then themselves; some may doe that acceptable to God, that thou couldst not doe without an evil conscience: The same honesty and sincerity may continue in a man, though in true wisdom and discretion he applies himself diversely, according as occasions are divers; as the hand remains the same, whether closed into a fist, or extended abroad, or bended this way or that way as occasion serves. Wherefore for your direction in this, take these five rules.

1. First, we are bound to give the best interpretation upon our brethrens actions we can, if they be not apparently ill; we should not do as the Logitians, Sequi partem deteriorem, but incline to that which may any way be conceived or hoped to have any goodness in it; we must rather wrong our selves by thinking too well of them, then wrong them by thinking too ill of them. This would help exceeding much to peace.

2. Secondly, we should rather be jealous of our selves then others, knowing more of the evils of our own hearts then we can do of any others.

3. Thirdly, if we know certaintly we are right, and others not, our hearts should rather be taken up with admiring and blessing Gods goodness to us for what he shewes us, then in censuring our Brethren for what he hath denied them.

4. We must remember, that not long since we were our selves of another mind, \& yet we sinned not against our light.

5. We must consider also, that in other things our Brethren see what they do not, and we would be loath to have such measure from them, that they should judge us, going against our light, and to be acted by ends in that we differ from them. We must grant that liberty to our Brethren we would have our selves; that is not to be involved in the judgments of others, but try all things, and keep what God makes known to us to be good; This liberty, says Luther. Paul hath given me, & I will stand to it, I wil not suffer it to be captivated.

The ninth Dividing Principle. Rules of prudence are sufficient to guide us in naturall things and civill affairs, and may as well suffice us in spirituall and Church-affaires.

A Great part of our divisions about Church-affairs comes from this Principle: If God would help us with right apprehensions about this, our divisions would in a great measure vanish. Those whose consciences are taken with a contrary principle, namely, that there must be institutions for all things that are properly Ecclesiastical and spirituall, they cannot yield to any such thing, till they see the stamp on, an institution upon it: Others who think because Prudence is enough to order civill affairs, there needs no institution for these things, they think such as stand for them to be too rigid and stiffe in their way.

It divides also upon this ground: In the corrupt estate of the Church (such as ours yet is) if we binde to institutions, we shall be sorely pinched with many things that will be very troublesome to us, but if we go according to the rules of common prudence, we may decline, or alter what would pinch, \\ and take up what may be commodious for us: Hence the principle is very desirable, if it can be maintained, men will strive hard before they will lose it; and on the other side, God is looked at as a jealous God, who will not suffer a mans wisdome to share with him in the things of his worship, which are spirituall and holy, to appoint and leave out as may be most com-commodious for the freedome of them from trouble, therefore they dare not yield to any Ordinance that is beyond civil, but upon some institution of Christ in his Word, and this divides.

Now for your help in this: As God hath given two lights to the world, the Sunne, the grater to rule the day; and the Moone, the lesser, to rule the night: So he hath given two Lights to man, to guide his course; the Scriptures the greater, to guide man, especially in his spiritual condition, in those more immediate references he hath to God, for his worship and enjoyment of communion with him: The other the les, the light of Reason, to be his guide in natural and civil things, in the ordering his life for his natural and civil good; and though it is true, Religion makes use of Reason, and we have help from the Scriptures in our natural and civil affairs, yet these two lights have their distinct special use, according to those distinct conditions of man.

When I say, we must have Scripture, and in it institutions for those things which are spiritual, and properly Church-affairs, I mean whatsoever is made use of for the drawing my soule nearer to God, or God nearer to me; or for the tending up my Homage to God, beyond what it hath in the nature of the thing, put into it by God; for that I must have an institution, I must not frame any such thing to my self; If I make use of anything of mine own, for such an end that I may worship God by, or that God might convey some spiritual efficacy to me in the use of it, because it is a thing that I thinke as fit for such an end, as other Ordinances I find in the Word, and yet have not an institution for it; in this I finde against Christ the Lord, who alone hath power to set apart the use of what he pleaseth, for the tending up homage to God, or the conveying of any spiritual efficacy from God into the hearts of his servants.

Mans natural and civil good is not so high, but reason and prudence will reach them; but for such things as these are, all the reason & prudence in the world lies too low, they can not without sinfull presumption attempt the putting any thing of their own in the place of these: Therefore there can be no other officers in the church, to act by any spiritual power, then what we find in the Word; no new Ordinances, no new Courts erected, no kind of authority, no extent of authority any further then we find in Scripture: The proof is evident, all Church Ordinances are for spiritual ends, to work by a spiritual efficacy, beyond what is natural or civil; and the efficacy of the power of government consists much in those who govern, if they have not their Charter to authorize their power and the extent of it, it loses its efficacy, though it be otherwise managed with never so much wisdom and justice; the same act that is an act of Justice in one, is murder in another; yea, the same man's act done within such limits is an act of Justice, and if done beyond those limits, it is murder.

But you will say, Surely there is use of reason and prudence in matters spiritual; how far may their use extend?

To the doing of these two things.

First, by reason I may compare institutions, and argue from one institution to another, and so find out institutions that lie more in the dark, by others which are more apparent. Though the thing that I gather be not terminis in Scripture, yet if I gather by necessary consequence from an institution, one or more, it hath the force of an institution in it: If I make Reason to be the Basis, the ground of my consequence, it will never rise up to that height as to raise an institution; but if I make some other institution the Basis of my consequence, then it may.

Secondly, when I have found out an institution, then reason & prudence comes in to help to manage this in a fit and comely way, applying it to fit persons and times, making use of fit reasons, due order, and whatever natural or civil conveniences may further the due administration of it. The Prelates abused that Scripture, Let all things be done decently and in order; for they joined institutions of their own to God's, to make them decent and orderly: But that Scripture only shews you when you have an institution of Christ, you are to apply by the use of reason and prudence, what natural or civil helps you can, for the better managing this institution of his.

From hence we have an answer to that Objection is made against against many things done by those who are in a Congregational way; what institution have they for many things they do? what for their Covenant? &c.

Answ. Though there be no Text of Scripture holds forth this in terminis, yet it is grounded upon other institutions, plainly held forth in Scripture.

First, it is clear in Scripture, that besides the Catholique Church there are particular Churches, Saints im-bodied, under such Officers, who are so Officers to them as they are not to others: These people can look upon this man as their Pastor, and this Pastor upon this people in a peculiar relation; they may do some acts of power over one another in their Congregation, which they cannot do over others in another Congregation: Now then it follows, they being a body, must needs have something to joyn them together; and the least thing that can be to joyn them, is the manifestation of their assent to joyn for those ends for which Christ hath appointed such a body; and what is their Covenant, but this? Onely some manifest their assent more largely, some more briefly; I know nothing more is required, but to manifest their assent to joyn with that body, to set up all the Ordinances of Christ so far as they know.

If there be any other thing done in their Churches wherein they make further use of reason and prudence, then in the two fore-named things, they cannot justifie it, but must acknowledge it evill.

The no. dividing Principle. The tenth Dividing Principle; or rather vaine conceit. Every difference in Religion is a differing Religion.

What do you hear more ordinary than this, How many Religions have we now? Shall so many Religions be suffered amongst us? we cannot tell now what Religion men are of; upon this apprehension they oppose such as differ from them in some few things, with all the violence they can, as men bringing up new Religions, and would take away their Religion from them; how can they possibly accord with men that are of a different Religion from them? Surely Surely we are more afraid then hurt, though our differences be sad enough, yet they come not up to this, to make us men of different Religions. We agree in the same end, though not in the same means; they are but different ways, of opposing the common adversary. The agreeing in the same means, in the same way of opposing the common enemy would be very comfortable, it would be our strength, but that cannot be expected in this world.

Livie in his story of a great Battail between Hannibal and Scipio, says, That at the joyning of the Armies, the shouting of Scipio's men was farre more terrible then the shouting of Hannibal's, because Scipio's men were all Romans, their shouting had all the same tone: but Hannibal's Army was made up of men of severall Countries, so that in their shouting there was variety of the tones of their voyce, which was not accounted so formidable a shout as the other. It is true, our adversaries do not look our opposition to them having so much diversity in it, so formidable as they would if we were all but one in our way of opposing them; But still we are all shouting against the common enemy; although therefore the terror upon our adversary would be greater, if our shout were more uniform; yet we hope the victory may be as sure.

Souldiers who march against a common enemy, all under the same Captain, who follow the same Colours in their Ensign, and wear them upon their hats or arms, may get the day, though they be not all cloathed alike, though they differ in things of lesse concernment.

Revel. 15. 2. we read of the Saints standing upon a sea of glass, which had fire mingled with it. Mr. Brightman interprets this sea of glass, the doctrine of the Gospel, more clear, more transparent then the doctrine of the Law, which, he says, was resembled by the sea of brashe that Solomon made; But there is fire mingled in this sea of glass, that is, faith hee. There are contentions & divisions in the Church, where this doctrine of the Gospel is taught: But yet mark what follows, They get the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, and had the harps of God, in their hands, and sang the song of Moses, &c.

Men who are in a crowd, tread one upon another, yet they all all make to the same door, they would all go the same way: Godly people are divided in their opinions and ways, but they are united in Christ; though they may be divided from such a particular society, yet they are not divided from the Church; it is with the Saints here, as with the boughs of trees in time of a storm; you shall see the boughs one beat upon another, as if they would beat one another to pieces, as if Armies were fighting, but this is but while the wind, while the tempest lasts; stay a while and you shall see every bough standing in its own order and comeliness, why? because they are all united in one root; if any bough be rotten, the storm breaks it off, but the sound boughs come into their former place. These times of division may break off men whose spirits were before unsound, they will never come in to joyne with the Saints again so as they seemed to doe in former times: but within a while when this gust is over, others may come in and shew themselves to be all united in, and receive sap from the same root.

CHAP. X IV.
Dividing Distempers, the lusts of mens hearts.

These divide us not only from God, but from one another. This I learne, saies Luther, from mine owne experience, that I have more cause to feare what is within me, than what is without. Whatever others do to divide us would prevail little, were it not for the lusts of our hearts within. Vapours that are got within the earth, are the cause of all earth- quakes, they rend and tear: the wind, storms, and tempests without never move it. Ill humours within the body, disturb more then the ayre without. James 4.1. Whence are wars and fightings amongst you? are they not hence, even from your lusts? Whence come they? The answer is soon made, Do you not see plainly that they come from your lusts? Yet were this Question put to some of us, Whence are all our divisions? Some would answer, Such kinde of men are the cause of them, and others would answer, Nay but such men cause them. We all put off the cause of our divisions from our selves; few would give Saint Saint James his answer, They are from hence, even from our lusts. There would not be such evill dililations from the head, if it were not for the malignant vapours that arise from the stomach. The curing the heart will sooner cure the head, then the curing the head will cure the heart.

Whence are wars? even from your lusts. The Apostle doth not here condemn wars simply; this was the error of the old Mantinees, raised up again by some amongst us, especially as the Wars are looked upon under that notion, raised for Religion. They seek to weaken our hands in these wars, by telling young people who have newly given their names to Christ, and therefore desire to be guided by the Word in all they do, whom God hath used under himself to be the strength of these wars, that they have no warrant to fight for Religion. To whom our Answer is, that we have a Civill right to the outward peaceable profession and practice of our Religion; we have the Laws of the Land for it, and for the maintenance of this right wee fight. There can be no reason given why our civil right we have to our Religion, may not as well be maintained by the sword, as our civil right to our houses and lands. This answers all objections against the maintenance of Religion by the sword, from the practice of the Christians in the Primitive times, who never sought to maintain Religion thus. We say their case was not the same with ours; they never had any civill right to the profession and practice of Religion in the Countrey where they lived, as we have.

The wars meant in this Text are contentions, jars, divisions amongst Christians; though they did not take up the sword one against another, yet there were many quarrels, jars, and divisions amongst them, these came from their lusts. The lusts of mens hearts are very quarrelom. Storms and tempests are here below in this impure muddy part of the world; in the higher part all is serene, calm, and clear. 1 Cor. 3. 3. For yee are yet carnall; how doth he prove that? whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are yee not carnall and walke as men? Strifes and divisions do manifest mens hearts to be very carnall.

August upon that place, Gen. 15. 10. where God required Abraham to take beasts and birds for sacrifice, the beasts were divided, divided, cut asunder, but not the birds: Thus (sai's he) by way of allusion) carnall brutish men are divided one from another, but not the birds, not those who are more spiritual, more celestial.

Ye walke as men, saies the Apostle, yee should not walk as men, ye should walk as it becomes those whose condition is raised above the condition of men, as it becomes Christians the redeemed ones of the Lord; you say, Can flesh and blood endure this? Can any man living beare this? what if it flesh and blood, what if a man cannot? A Christian may, a member of Jesus Christ who is God-man, may. Chrysostome in one of his Sermons to the people of Antioch, brings in Gods gracious dealing with Cain, as an example for them to imitate, in their carriage towards those who carry themselves ill towards them; He brings them in also replying, God indeed was gentle and patient toward Cain, for hee is God, he is above all passion, but we are but men; he answers them, Therefore did the Son of God come down, that he might make you as near as may be to God.

The Scripture saies, The Saints are made partakers of the divine nature; therefore do not say, We are but men. You must not walk as men, but as those who are endued with the Divine nature. It is a great charge that the holy Ghost lays up on the Corinthians, that they walked but as men; yet many come short of the lives of men: they rather walk as doggs, as tygers, as wolves. Gal. 5. 20. The fruits of the flesh are hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings. All these are the causes or workings of divisions: Surely our divisions are the fruits of the flesh. We see it in nature, the more spiritual any thing is, the more it unites; and the more gross the substance of any thing is, the lesse it unites; the beams of the Sun are of a kind of spiritual nature, therefore thousands of them will unite in puniot, but it is not so in other things; spiritual hearts in this are like the Sun beams, though thousands of them live together, they will unite in one so long as they continue spiritual. The three thousand Converts, Acts. 2. joyned with one accord, with one single heart: We find it now by experience, so long as there be but a few in a Church, they agree well, but usually when they come to be numerous, dissensions rise amongst them; this is an argument that the hearts hearts of men are not spiritual, still much flesh remains. Brackish water ascending to the Heavens, is sweetned, it comes down sweet from thence; thus those things which have trouble, which have an aptness to breed divisions, yet spiritual heavenly hearts having to do with them, they turn the nature of them, they work spiritual advantage out of them.

The higher fire ascends, the more it unites; the flame that is broad at the bottom, as it growes high, unites to be as the point of a needle. When the hearts of Christians keep below, and have a great deal of smoke amongst them, they do not so unite; but when they can get up high, O what close, single-hearted union is there! a crooked and a right line cannot joyn, but two right lines will joyn in every point.

The lufts of mens hearts cause divisions many ways:

First, they are mens own, therefore they will contend for them; nothing is a mans own, so much as his lufts; man aims wholly at himselfe in satisfying his luft: A Dog will barke, and bite, and flye in a mans face to preserve his own whelps.

Secondly, Mens lufts blinde their judgements; Perit judicium cum res transit in affectum; when the heart is tainted, the judgement is soone blinded; if the beame of the scale you weigh by, be not straight, the scale that hath the light weight may weigh down the heavier; if our hearts be crooked, warping to any finfull luft, what weight soever there be in any arguments to convince, the scale will goe according to the warping of the heart, the conclusion will follow the worse part.

3ly. Mens lufts weaken their spirits, so as they are not able to beare any thing that comes crosse to them; women, children, sick people, who are weakest, fall out most with one another; things that are rotten cannot hold together, every little touch breaks them asunder; that which is found hath strength to hold one part to another.

Fourthly, in mens lufts there is confusion, they cannot be kept in order, therefore they must needs cause disturbance, not only in mens owne spirits, but to all that have to deale with men acted by them; where there is confusion, there cannot be union; when there is right order in an army, though the men be never so numerous, never so differing in other respects, yet if they keep their ranks, they are all but one; but if put to a rout and confusion, then the bond of unity is broken, and every man divides from another to shift for himself.

5. In mens lufts there are contradictions; no virtue is contrary to another, but vices have nothing but contrarieties and contradictions in them. Mens lufts oppose and fight against one another in mens hearts; no marvail then when there are such fits within, though they break forth into quarrels and contentions without: If a man be quarrellsom in his family, no wonder if when he comes abroad, he quarrels and contends with his neighbours also.

6. Sixtly; In mens lufts there is violence, violence and peace cannot stand together. Isa. 60. 18. God promises peace, and there promisses, that violence should be no more heard in their Land. Mens lufts are boisterous and unruly, especially when they have been acting a while; at the first venting they seem to be fair, but after a while they grow outrageous: violent and boisterous dispositions are unfit for society.

You shall find in experience men who seem to be of weak spirits, of softly tempers, very remise in what they do ordinarily, yet let the lufts of these men be engaged in any cause, to any side, O how violent and impetuous will they be! they care not what they say or do, they will divide from God, from the publique, from their dearest friends, from their nearest relations, from what themselves have made profession of heretofore, from their credit, profit, from their own peace, from any thing, and all to serve a lust engaged in such a businesse; it is a dangerous thing to have a mans luft engaged, nothing can stand against an engaged luft, a man runs on headlong, he will break his conscience, he will desperately endanger his eternall breaking, to maintain the engagement of his luft.

7. In the lufts of mens hearts there is antipathy against God, against his ways, purity of his Ordinances, his Saints. Gen. 3. 15. I will put enmity between thee and the woman, between thy seed and her seed.

In Antipathy the opposition is,

1. In the nature of the things, therefore its deeply rooted, it comes not in accidentally; you may find two sheep fighting upon some accident, but the natures are not opposite, like the Wolfe and the Sheep.

2. The cause of this opposition is secret; wicked men have their spirits rise against the godly, but they are not able to say why: The husband loved his wife while she was carnall, now God hath turned her heart she is more obedient then ever, she seeks to give him content in all things more then before, she is more useful to him in all occasions, more faithfull, every way more lovely then before, only she is godly now; and was not so before; but his heart is now quite off from her, he dares not say that it is for her godliness, if he hath any conviction himself, but so it is that now he looks upon her with an evil eye, & an estranged heart: So a wicked Father or Mother, who loved their child exceedingly, before God was pleased to work upon him, yet now the child is more dutiful then he was, but the heart of the father or mother is taken off from him, can hardly endure him, ready to take any exception against him, their countenances are lowring and sadd towards him, they can give no reason for this their change, but as they were wont to say of Christians, Such a man is a good man, but he is a Christian. Bonus vir Caius Seius sed Christianus, non amo te, I love you not, but I can give no reason; Hoc tamen possum dicere, Non amo te, all that I can say is this, that I do not love you.

3. It is a settled, constant opposition: This hath been in all generations the great cause of division between the men of the world, and the Saints, and still it continues the same; you may see the same spirit of the old opposers of godliness and godly men, working in our days; the names of things may be changed, but the same kind of men for the same things are opposed and hated now in the same manner as in former generations.

4. It is very strong, ungodly men are exceedingly imbittered against the Saints. Ezek. 26. 6. Because thou hast clapped thine hands, and stamped with the feet, and rejoiced in heart, with all thy delight against the Land of Israel: This spirit of bitterness and indignation that was in them against the people of God, is feminally at least in all wicked men.
5. The enmity of Antipathy is incurable, it can never be taken away, except one ceases to be in its nature what it was; there can be no compounding things that are so contrary, one of them must cease to be, or turned into another nature, or else the opposition will be everlasting.

The great divisions amongst us are those that are between the seed of the woman, and the seed of the Serpent; some division: there are between those who are the seed of Christ, but the great strifes in the Kingdom come from the evil spirit there is in the seed of the Serpent against the godly in the Land. In the beginning of the Parliament, when men's liberties and estates being involved in one, there was good agreement, all men rejoiced, generally the countenances of those who were not Popish and Prelaticall, were serene, they had comfortable aspects one upon another; but when those whose spirits were opposite to the power of godliness, saw how the godly amongst them rejoiced, how their heads were lifted up, how their hearts were filled with hopes of good days, wherein Religion should be countenanced and honoured; that Antipathy that was in their hearts against the ways of God, boyled in them; though they were glad that they should be freed from some burdens, yet to see those whom they hated in their hearts, to rejoice so much, they could not bear, but their spirit rose against them, and in opposition to them they have raised these strifes, they have made these woful distractions that are amongst us.

Lastly, the lusts of mens hearts are the cause of our divisions, because God requires every man according to his place to make opposition against them; the cause of the strife lies not in those who oppose them, they do but their duty; but in those who nourish such lusts within them; yet we finde it ordinarily, that those who are most corrupt will cry out against those who oppose them in their wicked ways, as the cause of strifes and divisions, as if they were the troublers of Israel, whereas indeed themselves, the wicked lusts of their own hearts are the troublers of Israel, those who oppose their lusts desire all good to their persons. I remember Augustine in his Book about the unity of the Church hath this passage, The Son doth more grievously persecute his father by living naughtily, then then the father him by chastising him duly. Sarah's Maid did more trouble her by her wicked pride, then see her Maid by her deserved correction. Those men who are most faulty, are the men who are to be charged to be the greatest trouble in Church and State.

Thus in the generall, mens lusts are the cause of divisions; but let us enquire into the particular lusts of men, which wee may also charge: Wee shall find these dividing distempers to be as many as the dividing Principles: As the Philosopher speaks of four Cardinall virtues, so the first four that I shall name I may call the four Cardinall vices, these are Pride, Self-love, Envy, Passion or Frowardnesse; All the other distempers that cause divisions, have the poiyson of these four at the root of them. These are the Chariot wheels of the Furies, or the four horses that drawes them up and down hurrying from place to place.

CHAP. XVI.

The Pride of mens hearts the great dividing distemper.

Pride is the greatest Master of mis-rule in the world, it is the great incendiary in the soule of man, in families, in Townes, Cities, in all societies, in Church and State: This wind causeth tempests to arise. Prov. 13. 10. Onely by pride comes contention. The holy Ghost singles out pride, as the only cause of all contentions, because it is the chief; though there be many in a ryot, the whole usually is laid upon the ring-leaders. Pride is the ring-leader to all ryots, divisions, disturbances amongst us. Prov. 21. 24. Proud and haughty scorner is his name who dealeth in proud wrath. Pride may be well indicted for the great common Barrettor in all Towns, and Cities, and Kingdomes, it makes wofull troubles wherefover it comes. Mathematicians make this a rule to know when a thing is exactly round, and when it is exactly plaine; Round things will not touch but in puntil, if you lay plaine things together, they will touch in every part of them.

Proud
Proud hearts will joyne only in some things that concern themselves, but plain hearts will joyn in every thing wherein God may have glory, and their Brethren good.

Gouty swollen legs keep at distance one from another; bladders that are blown up with wind, spurt one from another, they will not close, but if you prick them, and so let out the wind, you may pack a thousand in a little room. Wee finde this by experience, when God gives us most success in our Armies, then are we most divided, then every man begins to look high, and to be sharking for himself; and when the Lord discountenances our Armies, and brings us low, then we think and speak ways of Accommodation, then we bewail our divisions with some brokenness of spirit: As it is with Souldiers when they are fighting against the common adversary, then they can agree well enough; but when they come to divide the spoile, or be put into their Garrisons, then they fall out: When we lye under the danger of the same common calamity, then we can agree; but when we come to share for our selves, then our spirits swell one against another.

We read in Scripture of the Manna that God gave his people; such was the nature of it that the heat of the Sun melted it. You will say, How could it then endure the heat of the oven? for they baked it in the oven; yet so it was, of a strange kind of nature, that it could bear the heat of the oven, and not the heat of the Sun. Even of such a temper are our hearts; the heat of the Sunnes, of prosperity dissolves us, causes us to runn one from another, but the heat of the fire of affliction bakes us, brings us, and settles us together; it makes us to be one, it takes away our rawness, it consumes many of our ill humors, and so composes our spirits into one.

The stupidity of our hearts is such, as we do not make our brethrens case, who suffer the rage of these wars, our owne; But we for the present having some more liberty, then formerly, we are lifted up, and in the pride of our hearts pulh at our brethren, and smite our fellow-servants: If the dogges be at a little distance from us, though we even heare the cries of our brethren who are worried by them, yet we foolishly bleffe our selves in our present case, enjoyments, and hopes, as if our fleth must be spared, our estates, our liberties and enjoyments must be continued, yea raised, whatsoever becomes of others. Oh sinfull vaine spirits, befooled and hardned with their pride!

But what are the severall workings of pride that make such a stir in the world?

First, A proud man thinks himself too great to be crossed, Shall I beare this? I will make you know what it is to doe such things against me; he thinks it a great dishonour to him to beare any thing, therefore he must needs quarrel and contend, if it be but to shew what a man of spirit he is, or to shew that he is a man of such worth, as whatsoever others beare, yet it is not fit for him to bear it; it is but reason that such a man as he should make men who will presume to crosse him, to yeeld to him, to stoop under him. Now when one proud man thinks it a dishonour for him to put up wrongs from another who it may be is as proud as himself, and he thinks it a dishonor for him to put up wrong, what peace can there be? some wrongs must be put up, but proud men will never agree who shall begin.

Secondly, because his spirit swells so big, he thinks every thing that crosseth him to be very great; his sufferings are great to him according to what great thoughts he hath of himself, according to the excellency or meanesse of any person: So are his sufferings to be reckoned, sufferings of a man in eminency are judged according to his eminency and place; if a mean man suffer the same things, they are not accounted so great; now whether a man be great really, or in his owne apprehension, its all one in regard of his esteem of his sufferings, he thinks himselfe therefore intollerable, because they are against himself.

Dan. 3. 14. Is it true O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednegs? Do not ye serve my gods? that which you have in your books, is it true? Arius Montanaus translates, Nunquid desolation: what, is there desolation made? what, you to oppose the command of a King? if this be suffered, what desolation must needs follow? Add indeed the root from whence the word comes, signifies desolari, to make desolate: why? was it a desolation that these three poor innocent men made, because they would not, nay nay, they could not do as this proud K. would have them? what made him thus to aggravate the offence, but meekly the pride of his heart? he thought that any thing cross to his command was a most hainous offence, a thing most horrid in the very mention of it, no leafe then the utter undoing of all things. Pride ever aggravates any thing done against its owne mind. This in Dan. that Montanus turns, Nunquid desolatio, Buxtorfuim translates rum de industria; what on purpose? you doe it on purpose to provoke me; thus proud men and women in their families, whatsoever children or servants do amisse; what? you do it on purpose to anger me, do you? When the winde comes cross the streame, the waters rage: So does the will and affections of a proud heart, when any thing crosseth it.

3. Pride makes men dwell beyond their bounds; the way to keep all things in union is for every man to keep within his bounds, the dwelling beyond tends to the breaking all in pieces. Hab. 2. 5. He is a proud man, neither keepeth at home, who enlargeth his desire as hell, and cannot be satisfied. If any humour of the body goeth beyond its bounds, it brings much trouble to it, the health and peace of the body consists in the keeping of every humour within its vessel and due proportion.

4. Pride hardens mens hearts. Dan. 5. 20. His minde is hardned in his pride. If you would have things cleave, you must have them soft, two flints will not joyn; the Spanyard hath a Proverb, Lime and stone will make a wall, if one be hard, yet if the other be yeelding, there may be joyning, and good may be done, not else.

5. Pride causes men to despise the persons, actions, and sufferings of others, nothing is more unsufferable to a mans spirit then to be vilified. A proud man despises what others do, and others what he does, every man next to his person, desires the honour of his actions. If these two be contemned, his sufferings will likewise be contemned by the proud: This also goes very neer to a man; one man thinks what another man suffers is nothing, no matter what becomes of him; another thinks his suffering's nothing, and no matter what becomes of him. O at what a distance now are mens hearts one from another!
6ly. Pride causes every man to desire to be taken notice of to have an eminency in some thing or other; if he cannot be eminent on one side, he will get to the other; he must be taken notice of one way or other: when he is in a good and peaceable way, God makes some use of him; yet because he is not observed, and looked upon as eminent, he will rather turn to some other way, to contend, strive, to oppose, or any thing, that he may be taken notice of to be some body, that he may not goe out of the world without some noyse: What shall such a man as I? of such parts, such approved abilities, so endued by God to doe some eminent service, be laid aside, and no body regard me? I must set upon some notable worke, something that may draw the eye of observance upon me. I have read of a young man, who set Diana's Temple on fire, and being asked the reason, he said, That he might have a name, that the people might talk of him. Because he could not be famous by doing good, he would by doing evil. Proud spirits will venture the setting the Temple of God, yea Church and State on fire, that they may have a name, whatsoever they do or suffer; to get a name they will rather venture, then dye in obscurity, that of all things they cannot bear.

7. A proud man would have others under him; and others being proud too, would have him under them; he would have others yield to him, and others would have him yield to them, where will the agreement then begin? What is that which hath rent and torn the world in all ages, that hath brought woful distractions, perplexities, confusions, miseries in all countries by wars, but the pride of a few great ones, seeking to bring one under another? Those wasting Wars of the Romans between Sylia and Marius, Caesar and Pompey, were they not from hence? It is hard for men in great places, and of great spirits, to accord long. Melanthon in his Comment upon Prov. 13. 10. says concerning such men, there was wont to be this Proverb, Duo montes non miscentur, Two mountains will not mixe together.

8ly. A proud man makes his will to be the rule of his actions, and would have it to be the rule of other mens too, and other men being proud too, would have their wils the rule of their Proud man opposes others, because they have begun such a work; and others, who are also proud, oppose him, because they had good motions, but the cause of God mult. not go on. Christ must be the cause to begin a good work, if they fea any difficulty in it, and yet the cause of God mult. not go on. Christ must not be admitted, if they have not been at the beginning. Let two men carrying a long piece of timber in a narrow passage, one man will go before, and the other man will go before; they can never carry it in, because they cannot agree who shall go formofr.
Pride makes insolent. A proud man, says the Philosopher, is a faigner of boldnesse and valour, and therefore will foolishly venture upon any thing.

12. If there is any thing to be done that is conceived to be mean and low, a proud man will seek to put it upon others, and others who are proud will seek to put it upon him, and if it be a work of credit, then he seeks it to himself, and others seek it to themselves, and hence are jarrings and divisions.

13. If there be any good success in any thing, then pride makes one man attribute it to himselfe, and another man attribute it to himself; and if the success be ill, then one puts it off from himself, and and another from himself, and thus quarrels and contentions are raised and fomented.

14. One proud man thinks himself the only worthy man to have his counsel followed, and his desires satisfied, and the other he thinks himself the man that should have his counsel followed, and his desires satisfied, and thus men struggle and oppose one another.

Lastly, one proud man is very discerning in the discovery of pride in another; and though he entertains it in his owne bosome, yet he hates it in others wherefover he sees it: This is a peculiar curse upon this sin, one Drunkard loves another, one whoremaster another, but one proud man hates another. This is exemplified notably in Boniface the second, Bishop of Rome, he says of Aurelius Bishop of Carthage, and of the rest of those who were present at the sixth Council of Carthage, that through the instigation of the Devil, they swelled with pride against the Roman Church, he means against the supremacy of it, for it was spoken upon the submission of Eulalias Bishop of Carthage, to the Chair of Rome. Behold the proud Bishop of Rome, who would have all the preheminence himself, swells with pride against the pride of others.

Here we see what a make-bate Pride is; That which Tertullus said to Felix, Acts 24. 2. is true of Humility, By thee we enjoy great quietnesse; but the contrary is as true of Pride, By thee are made wofull divisions, by thee we suffer miserable disturbance. Though there be no occasion of quarrel, yet pride will make some; only by pride comes contention, as before, Prov. 13. 10.
though there be nothing else but pride, and in the Hebrew it is דַּבָּט jurgium, give contention, if there be no cause given, it will make it.

Now let every man look into his own heart, and see what pride hath been, and still is there, and be humbled before the Lord for this. All you contentious, froward, quarrelsome people, you are charged this day from God to be men and women of proud spirits, and what evil there is in our sad divisions, that pride in your bosom is a great cause of. Saint Paul did beat down his body, lest after he had preached to others, he should become a reprobate. Let us all, and especially Ministers, labour to beat down our spirits, lest after all our profession and glorious showes, we at last become Reprobates, at least such as God may cast out for the present in this world; taking no delight in making use of; what in such times as these are to have hearts swollen and lift up in pride? God is now about the flaining the pride of the earth. How unseasonable and dangerous is it for a Marriner to have his top-sails up, and all spread in a violent storme? it is time then to pull downe all, lest he be sunk irrecoverably. The point of a needle will let the wind out of a bladder, and shall not the swords of God, the swords of Warre and Plague, that have got so deep into our bowels, let out the windy pride of our hearts? The bashtiness of men shall be bowed downe, and the Lord himself will be exalted. The Lord humble us, that he may reconcile us, not only to himselfe, but to one another.
CHAP. XVI.

Selfe-love, the second dividing distemper.

This is neer akin to the former: Phil. 2. 3. Let nothing be done through strife; Ver. 4. Looke not every man on his owne things, but every man also on the things of others: This is the cause of strife, because men looke so much on their owne things. Many will have no peace, except their own party be followed; Jefu-like, What hast thou to do with peace? follow me. It is not Peace, but Party that they mind. Maxima pars studiorum est studium partium: The greatest part of their studies, is to studie sides and parts. Luther upon Psalm 127. hath a notable speech, I am of that opinion, says he, that Monarchies would continue longer then they doe, were it not for that same litte Pronoun [Ego] that same [I] (my selfe.) Yea certainly could this same Selte be but laid aside, all governments and societies would not only continue longer, but flourish better.

Selfe-love is the cause of our divisions.

First, where this prevails, men love to take in all to themselves, but let out nothing from themselves; this must needs divide societies in Church and State, for they are Bodies; if one member in the body takes in all to it selfe, and lets out nothing from it self to other members; as suppose the arm or leg takes in all the blood and spirits that comes into strengthen it selfe, and when it hath got them in, there keeps them, and lets out none to another member, how soon would the members drop one from another? The whole world is maintained by mutual communication of one creature to another; take away that, and the world dissolves presently.

2ly. Those who are acte by self-love, have no common ends to joyne them, therefore they cannot close; if they be employed in publike service, they quickly warp to their private ends. Take two boards never so straight, yet if one be seasoned and the other green, they will lye close a while, but ere long you will find that the unseasoned will divide from the other by warping, especially when heat comes to it. Thus many at the first, Oh who but they for the publike, for the common good;
good; but there being a principle of Selfe within, like the sap in the board, when they began to feel heat, some difficulties rising, they warped to their own ends, and divided from those they were imploymed with. Mens private ends are narrow, they cannot drive on them, but they will meet with one another, & jufle one another, quarrel, contend, and fight for the way, as Car-men doe when they meet in narrow streets, and Boat-men in narrow passages. If we had publique ends, our way would be broad enough, we might go on peaceably and comfortably without, without prejudice to one another. If a man lived alone, then he might goe on quietly in his way, only God would meet him in it; but seeing men live in the world amongst others, they must consider, that if they will drive on their own designs, & work their own ends, othermen have designs and ends to drive on and work as well as they: it is therefore impossible but you will croffe and be croffed, you will vex and fret at others, and others will vex and fret at you. What soever is such, says Tullie, wherein many cannot excell, in that there is for the most part such contention, as society can hardly be kept entire.

31. Self makes every man judge of things according to what is in himself. I have read of Blackmores, when they paint an Angel, they paint him black like themselves; and when they paint the Devil, they paint him white, as much different from themselves as they can: Thus men acted by Selfe, the fouleft, blackeft opinion, yet if suitable to their judgments, they will set out like Angels with the faireft glosses that may be; and that which is truth, if disagreeing from them, they will paint it out in the fouleft manner that can be; they labor so to besmear it, that if it be possible it shall looke like a Devil. If a selfish man be conscious of not having that which is commendable, he will not believe that others hath it: As Nero being abominably filthy, would not believe there was any chaffman in the world: whatsoever evil he doth, he thinks all men if they had the like opportunity, would do the fame; if they have plots to fetch about their own ends, they think every man is plotting too.

4. Selfe makes much stir and trouble, for it is a very odious thing; Omne affectium odiosum: as vermine are odious, because they only take into themselves, consume things, and are no way useful to any thing else. When any thing doth but smell of Self, it begins to be loathed; let a man have never such excellent parts, do never such excellent things, yet if Self appears, the loveliness and glory of all is gone; therefore those men that act Self, they had need be very cunning, to keep in and hide it; herein appears what a vile thing Self is, that though in truth it acts all, and receives the incomes of all, yet it dares not appear, but lies sculking under all the covers it can; how vile is this Self, for which all must be done, which thou makest thy God, yet cannot in the least appear, but is odious and abominable to every one? yea it is conscious to it Self, that it is so, and therefore dares not appear; yet the acting of it is very mischievous to all humane Societies.

Fifthly, There is this wickednesse in Self-love, that even those things that men acknowledge to be right and good in the generall, yet if in the particular they shall not suit with something they would have, it will put men upon the opposing it; and what peace and union can there be amongst men, if what they will grant and commend to be good, yet when it falls cross to them, they will oppose and contend against? Thus Acts 26.7. Unto which promise our twelve Tribes instantly serving God night and day hope to come, for which hopes sake I am accused of the Jewes. The twelve Tribes, the whole body of the Jewes constantly grant the promise of the Resurrection, and yet in malice to me they accuse me of this; or if not so, yet they are willing that I should sink in this cause: Just as many Ministers were wont in their Pulpits to commend highly the wayes of Religion, to exhort men to grow up in godliness, to be carefull of all their wayes; but when some of their Parishioners did but practice in the particular, what themselves had commended to them in the generall, they would hate them, and persecute them for it. God deliver us from such a spirit.

Sixthly, Selfe causes men who are in publique employment to keepe up their private jarres and grudges, to interrupt the publike, they will crosse one another in their work for the publike; let that suffer, so they may let one another feel of their private grudges: In this Christians are beneath Heathens. I have read of Aristides and Themistocles, who had many jarings rings between themselves, but being both employed in the work of the Common-wealth, in an Embassage, as they went over the Mountains, one layes thus to the other, Let us lay downe all our private grudges upon these mountaines, at least till our businesse be over, and if there shall be just cause when we have done our worke for the Common-wealth, we may then examine them. It were happy with us, if all men in publique employment in this Land would from their hearts speak thus to one another, but men are selfish and cannot do it: Hence comes so many of our breaches and divisions.

7ly. Selfe causes men not to see their own evils; or if they do, to indulge themselves in them, but to be quick-fighted and severe in the discovering and opposing those evils there are in others, and this causes many breaches and fallings out. We may apply that of the Apostle, 1 Cor. 13. Love covereth a multitude of faults to selfe-love. Selfish men see little evil in themselves, all is ever well with them whatsoever others do; and the more they cocker themselves, the more severe they are to others; but Christ would have the quite contrary, severity to our selves, but indulgence to others; those that are so, are the most peaceable men. Mat. 18. 8. If thy hand or foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee; or if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out. We must deale severely with our selves in those things that are as near and dear to us as our hands and eyes; but Ver. 15. When Christ gives order how we are to deale with our Brethren, he then requires more moderation; If thy Brother offends thee, goe and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; If he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, and see what thou canst doe with him that way; yea, and after that tell the Church, not presently cut him off, or cast him away, as you must do when your hand or eye offends you; If men have any indulgence, let it be exercised towards their Brethren; if they have any severity, let them exercise that against themselves. I remember I have read of Pliny, that he says of himself, That he so passed by other mens offencers, as if himself were the greatest offender; and hee was so severe against himself, as if hee meant to pardon none. If it were so with us, we should live at more peace one with another then we do.

8. Self-
8. Selfishnesse causes reservednesse; great self-lovers never care for communion but with such as are either far above them, that so they may get from them, and have credit by conversing with them, or with those that are under them, for they will admire them, they may rule amongst them: In the company of either of these, they will let out themselves fully; but if there be an equality, then you shall have little from them, there is nothing to draw forth Selfe, there soone growes a strangenes between them and such, union will not hold where communion is not free; if there be but an interruption of the freadome of communion, the union will soon break.

You will say, These were wont to be very entire friends, how came they to break? what hath either of them done?
what unkindnesse hath befalne them?

None at all, onely that principle of Selfe was not so fully fed as it would be; upon that they began to be reserved, and so strange, and at last quite fell off from one another, from former love and friendship, and then every little thing caused grudging between them.

Ninthly, Self sets mens wits on work in all cunning craf-tinesse, to fetch others about to their own ends, and this goes as much against a mans spirit as any thing: When he comes to discern it, no man can abide to be circumvented, to be as it were rid upon, to be made serviceable only to another mans ends: the more cunning there is in it, the more odious and abominable it is to a mans spirit, when it comes once to be perceived, a man cannot bear it. Crooked windings are the goings of the Serpent: But if a man shall not onely seek to make use of another to serve his own turne by him, but after he hath done that, then to cast him off to shift for himselfe; this is so provoking a thing, as it make breaches irreconcilable.

10. When one is for Self in his wayes, he teaches another to be so in his; As a man by conversing with the froward, learns to be froward: so many who have heretofore had plain hearts, full of love & sweetnes, yet by being acquainted much with selfish politque men, learn to be so too; I see how he hooks in himselfe in every thing, fetches about this way and that way, but still gets it to come to selfe; I perceived it not

at my first acquaintance with him, and then my heart was let out to him fully, but now I see every man is for himself, and why should not I be so too? and what then is like to become of the publique?

Surely this selfishnesse is very vile in the eyes of God; God hath made us members of a community, the Universe is maintained by union, therefore the creatures will venture the destroying themselves in going contrary to their nature, rather than there should not be union in the world; that which they do in a natural way, we should do by the strength of reason, much more by grace. Philosophers say there cannot be a vacuity in the world; The world could not stand, but would be dissolved, if every part were not filled, because Nature subsists by being one; if there were the least vacuity, then all things should not be joined in one, there would not be a contiguity of one part with another. This is the reason that water will ascend when the ayre is drawn out of a pipe, to fill it; this is to prevent division in nature; O that we had but so much naturalnesse in us, that when we see there is like to be any breach of union, we would be willing to lay down our self-ends, to venture our selves, to be any thing in the world that is not sin, that we may help to a joining: O foolish heart, that in such a time as this art selfish, when the danger is publike! As in a storm, when the Ship is in danger, if every Mariner should be bure about his own Cabbin, dressing and painting that, what infinite foolish folly were it? and is it not our case? It were just with God to leave thee to thy self hereafter, if thou wilt look so much to thy selfe now. Ezek. 22. 16. And thou shalt take thine inheritance in thy selfe in the sight of the Heathen, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord: This is in a way of threat, as appears if you compare it with vers. 14, 15. Woe to us if God leaves us to our selves. I have heard of a story of a fool being left in a chamber, and the door locked, and all the people gone, he cries out at the window, Oh my selfe, my selfe, O my selfe, nothing else came from him but O my self. Such fools have we amongst us now, nothing but Selfe is in their thoughts, their hearts and endeavours. The Apostles complaint, Phil. 2. 21. may justly be be ours. All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's.
Their own things, that is, says Chrysostome, their pleasure and their security, their temporal commodities, their profits, their honours: So others, why are not the comforts, the safeties, the honours of the Saints the things of Christ, doth not Christ own them? Are they not under his protection and care?

CHAP. XVIII.

The third Dividing Distemper, Envy.

Envy is a squint-eyed fool, Job 5. 2. Envy lyeth the silly one. Jam. 3. 14. If yee have bitter envying and strife in your hearts. Envy is a bitter thing, and causes strife, and makes that bitter too: So ver. 16. Where envying and strife is. Gal. 5.
20. Hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings. 1 Cor. 3. 3. There is among you envying, strife, divisions. Envy made divisions between Angels and men; it was the first sinne, not the first born of the Devil, but that which turned Angels into Devils. The first heart-division amongst men was between Cain & Abel, and what caused it but envy?
Who can stand before envy? She is subtil, undermining, dares not appear at the first: but if she cannot be satisfied with her under-works, then she slings, rends, frets, and fights, uses vio-

ence, seeks to raise a contrary faction, fals on any thing in the world so be it mischief may be done, let become of God's glory, of service to the publike, of saving souls, rather than that.

feem, respect and honour that otherwise might be had, should not be obtained; all must come under, all must be serviceable to this base lust; rather then the glory of an envious man must be eclipsed, God himself and his blessed Truth must be darkned: Oh hideous wickednesse and high impudence against the God of Heaven! Envy divides in Counsels, in instruments, actions, in all proceedings; she will make use of good to oppose that which is good; if she cannot raise evil men to oppose good, she will seek to get good men to oppose; she would make God contrary to himself, she would strike at God with his owne sword. Phil. 1. 15. Some preach Christ out of envy. As Envy makes use of good for evil, so God makes use of this evil for good: Many seek to excell in preaching, or otherwise, by this means; and sayes S. Paul, Howsoever I doe rejoice, and will rejoice. If Envy cannot reach others by imitation, she will reach them by calummiation. Zoilus the common flandering, being asked why he spake evil of such and such men? Because, sayes he, I can doe no evill to them. If there be any good done, that she seeks to blast, together with the instruments of it; if any evil, that she rakes into, and feeds upon, like that Bird Ibis in Africa, that eats Serpents. Luther sayes, envious men feed upon the dung of other men; they are like flies, that love to be upon stores. Erasimus tells of one, who collected all the lame defective verses in Homer, and passed over all that were so excellent. When you see a man seeking to rake and gather together all he can of any distempers, disorders, mistakes, miscarriages by hear-sayes, letters, or any way; so be it he may fill up his dung-cart; and for the good, the graces or gifts of God in men, those are laid aside, or slightly passed over, if at all mentioned, it is with some dirt mingled: Surely this is an envious man fitted for strife and debate, whom God permits to be an afflication to his people, in raising up a spirit of strife and contention; and causing divisions amongst them, like the Kite, who passes over faire Medowes, and pleasant fields, not regarding them, till she meets with a carrion, there she falls and fastens, now she is upon her prey where she would be: How pleasant is it to some men to hear of, or find out evil in others whom they do not love? To say no worse, you know how it hath been an old practice, to seek to get any thing thing by reports, or any other ways that might blast the professors of Religion; and how glad were they? how did it please them at the heart if they could meet with any thing that might serve their turne?

This is a very shamelfull distemper, some men will upon occasion confesse they fear other men, and others that they love not other men, or that they contain others, but no man will acknowledge that he envies others, there is too much shame in this, to be owned by any. The impiety and wickednesse is not lefse, it is a monstrous wickednesse for a man to complains of God, that he made the world no better; and yet such wickednesse there is in some mens hearts, but what is it then to complains of, and quarrel with God, that he hath made the World, or any part of it so well? This the envious man doth.

An envious man cannot endure to see others better then himselfe, or to have more respect then himself. It is reported of Licinius an intimate familiar with Constantine the Great, who also married his sister, but fell off to be a desperate enemy against Christians, alleging this to be the reason, because in their Assemblies they prayed for Constantine, and not for him. Envious men, whether they deserve respect or no, yet if others have it, and not themselves, they rage, and are mad.

There is no vice but hath some kind of opposition to some other, as covetousnesse to prodigality, &c. but Envy only opposeth that which is good, and all good, therefore there is nothing in it but evil, and an univerfal evil. Gulielmus Parisiensis brings in Gregory, saying, That all the poyson in the old Serpent is in this sinne, as if it had emptied it selfe of its poyson, and vomited it in this sinne, so much venom there is in it.

Is it not a very evil thing, that in mens opposition against what they see others desire, they should give this reason why it should not be suffered, because if it be, the greater part of the most godly people in all places will joyn with it? This brings to mind what I have read in Ecclesiasticall History: in the Second Century, The Emperour Adrian would have built a Church for the honour of Christ void of Images, because such was the custome of the Christians; but his friends dissuaded him, him, saying, If he did so, all men would forfake the Temples of the gods, and become Christians. I find in that learned piece of Voetius, Desperata causa papatus, a notable story of Raynerius a Popish Inquisitor, he-exclaims against the Waldenses, those poor men of Lions (as he calls them) He lays there was never any more pernicious Sect then that; and I pray why? He gives 3. reasons; First, That it is very ancient; Some say (says he) it hath continued from the time of Sylvester; others, from the times of the Apostles. Secondly, It is so generall, there is scarce any Countrey but this hath got into it. Thirdly, whereas others are guilty of blasphemy against God, upon which they are abhorred, these appear to be holy men, they live justly, their belief of God is right, they believe all the Articles in the Creed; We can finde no fault with them either for their lives, or for their Doctrine, only they are against the Church of Rome, in which the people are ready to joyn with them. There are strange accusations; for do not they themselves make all these the signs of the true Church? and yet are these poor men so vile, because such things are found amongst them. Surely, it is Envy that imbibers the spirites of men against others, because they see in them those things which they cannot but acknowledg to be good, and herein the great evil of Envy, that malignity of it, by which it causeth such great contentions does appear, they are angry they can find no evil in them, whereby they may get advantage against them.

The holy Ghost says, that envy is rottenness to the bones; the same learned man Guliel. Paris. applyes this to such as are chief in Church and Common-wealth, who are as it were the bones, the strength, the support of the Societies whereof they are; Envy, says he, is often found amongst them, and it is rottenness to them. This vile sin hath caused a rot in many men of eminent abilities and places, who might otherwise have done much service for God & his people in Church and Commonwealth: oh it is a michievous sin. Take away envy, says Augustine, and what is mine, you have; take away envy, and what is yours, I have. We read Acts 11. of Barnabas, that hee was a good man, man, and full of the holy Ghost, and he was a man of a cleaning disposition, of an uniting temper, ver. 23. He exhorted them that with full purpose of heart they would cleave to the Lord: This man was free from envy, for the Text saies, when he had seen the grace of God, he was glad : He rejoiced in, and blessed God for the grace he saw in his Saints. Do you envy for my sake, says Moses? I would to God all the people of the Lord did prophesie. Moses was a fit man for publick service, who was so void of envy; No men are so fit for publick employment as such who can bles God that he is pleased to make use of others as well as, yea beyond themselves. It was a good speech of that gracious holy, old Disciple Mr. Dod lately deceased, I would to God says he, I were the worst Minister in England; not willing himselfe worse then he was, but all Ministers better.

The fourth dividing Distemper, Passion.

Prov. 29. 23. An angry man stirreth up strife. Passion is so opposite to Union, that Prov. 22. 24. the holy Ghost would have us make no friendship with an angry man.

First, this fire of anger burns alunder the bands of union, the bands of relation, as Nebuchadnezzars fire did the bands of the three Children. A froward heart cares not for any relations. What makes divisions between husband & wife, brother and brother, servants and Masters, and Mistresses, neighbour and neighbour, but passionate frowardness?

Secondly, this fire burns alunder the bands by which mens lusts were tyed up and kept in; it sets mens lusts at liberty. The lusts of mens hearts are like a bed of snakes in the cold, but the heat of passion warming them, causes them to crawl and hisse. What a stir would the Lions in the Tower make, and the Bears in Paris-garden, if they were let loose? Passion lets mens Lion-like lusts loose. Philosophers say of the inferiour Orbes, that were they not kept in, restrained in their motion by the Trimum mobile, they would set all the world on fire: If our lower affections, especially this of Anger, be not kept in and ordered by Reason and Religion, they will set all on fire. Passion.
fion makes men and women to be lawlesse, boundlesse, care-leffe.

Men know not what they doe in their anger; this raises such a smoak, that they cannot see their way; the more corrupt the heart is, the greater and the more noisome is the smoke raised by this fire in the heart. Put fire to wet straw, and filthy stuffe, oh what a filthy smoke ariseth!

Lev. 13. 25. we read of a leprosie breaking out of a burning; seldom doe men passions burne, but there is a leprosie breaking out of that burning, and what union can there be with such? If froward people were dealt with all like the Lepers, shut up from others, we should have more peace. Some men when once their anger is got up, they will never have done, we can have no quiet with them; this fire in them is like that of hell, unquenchable. The dog-dayes continue with them all the year long. Seven devils can better agree in one Mary Magdalen, then seven froward people in one family. If one should set the Brakons on fire upon the landing of every Cock-boat, what continuall combustions and tumults would there be in the Land? Those men who upon every trifle are all on a fire by their passions, and what in them lies let others on fire, do exceedingly disturb the peace of those places where they live, those societies of which they are. Their hot passions cause the Climate where they live to be like the torrid Zone, too hot for any to live near them. Christ is the Prince of Peace, and the Devil is the Prince of divisions. Hence that expression of the holy Ghost, Ephes. 4. 27. Let not the sun goe down upon your wrath, neither give place to the devil: you are loth to give place to your brother, you will say, What, shall I yield to him? you will not yield to him, but you will yield to him that is worse, to the Devil. So you doe when you yield to wrath. There are divers other dividing diftempers that we shall speak to; but for the present let us make use of the great mercy of God towards us that yesterday we solemnized in a publick Thanksgiving; let us see how we may improve this glorious work of God for the closing of our spirits, the healing our divisions. It calleth us aloud to joyn, oh let your hearts joyn. There are 12: Arguments in this great work of God, to perswade us to union. First,
First, there hath appeared much of God's presence in this his great work. I will praise thee O Lord, for thou hast done it, Ps. 52: 9. The Lord hath appeared wonderfully, his naked arm hath been revealed, his right hand hath become glorious in power. Those who were present saw much of God in this work. They send to us to give God the glory, and all the Countrey about send still to tell us how much of God they have seen in this.

But how is this an argument for us to unite?

Suppose children or servants were wrangling one with another, were not this an argument to make them be quieter, Your Father is here? your Mr. is come? will not all be whist presently? God is come amongst us, we may see the face of God in what he hath done for us, and shall we be quarrelling before his face?

But 3. days before this great goodness of God, by speciall Order from the House of Commons, there was a day set apart to humble our souls before the Lord, and to seek him for this mercy that now we rejoice in, & in our Humiliation was not this one great sinne we did confess our divisions? did we not then acknowledg that it were righteous with God because of our divisions, to give us up as a prey to our adversaries? Now then, have not our divisions overcome God's goodness, left God's goodness overcome our divisions? Suppose there had been a day of Humiliation set apart to mourn under the heavy hand of God against us in delivering us up into the hands of our enemies, as (throuh his mercy we have had a day of Thanksgiving, to bleffe him for our deliverance from them) would not this sinne have been the matter of a great part of the confession of all your Ministers? Oh the divisions that are amongst us! Thou hast dealt righteously with us. Our wraths were up one against another, and just it is with thee O Lord to let out the rage of the Adversary upon us; & shall we yet continue in that after a mercy, which we have confessed might justly have prevented the mercy? shall we still be guilty of that with our consciences tell us would have been the burden of them, as the just cause of our misery, if the Lord had come against us in his fore displeasure? God forbid. Let not that evil now be found in in us, that would have galled our consciences, if mercy had been denied us.

3. We are delivered from being devoured by our enemies; shall we now devour one another? oh unworthy we of such a deliverance as this. It went ill with us in the beginning of the fight, but God looked mercifully upon us, his bowels wrought, if I come not in for their help. These ungodly men will devour my servants, howsoever they have been faire to some, because yet they have not attained their own ends; but if they prevail here, they will account all their own, and then they will begin to exercise that cruelty that yet hath not been heard of, but it shall not be, my heart cannot bear the cries of my servants under such cruelties as I foresee. Do you think this was God's end in delivering us from being devoured of our enemies, that we may be devoured one of another? We read Ezek. 5-3, 4. the Prophet was bid to bind up a few hairs in his skirt, which was to signify a few of the people which were preserved from that common calamity, but after these were cast into the fire, and fire came forth from these to all the house of Israel. Polanus upon the place hath this note, that grievous evils may come upon those who have been preserved from former common miseries, and those who for a while have been preserved by their contentions and divisions, may be the cause of woful evil to others. God forbid that this Text should be fulfilled in us. Let not a fire come from us, who yet are so graciously preserved, to devour the house of Israel.

4 ly. God in this work of his hath join'd severall sorts of instruments, men of severall opinions; he hath made them one to do us good, why should not we be one in the enjoyment of that good? Let the one part, and let the other part have their due honour under God, in the mercy God hath made use of both, and why may not both enjoy the fruit of this mercy together in the Land?

Fiftly, We were not without some feares, lest God should leave us in the work of Reformation begun; but now God speaks aloud to encourage us, he tells us he owns the worke. Now what doth this require of us? A little Logick will draw the consequence, Hath God declared himself that he intends to go on in this work he hath begun? Then let us all joyn to-gether, gether, to further it, to the uttermost we can; let us not exasperate the spirits of one another in ways of strife and opposition, but let every one set his hand and hand to this worke, that he may be able to say, Oh Lord God, thou that knowest the secrets of all hearts, knowest that upon this great mercy of thine, my heart was so moved, that whatsoever I could possibly see to be thy will for the furtherance of this great work of Reformation, and that I was able to doe, I did set my selfe to doe it, and am resolved to spend my strength and life in it. If every one did thus, oh what glory might God have from this mercy of his!

61v. When the Lord comes to us with mercies, and such great mercies, he expects we should rejoice in them, and sing praise; but how can we sing without Harmony? Prayer requires an agreement. Mat. 18. 19. If two of you shall agree on earth touching any thing they shall aske, it shall be done for them. Surely Praise requires agreement much more. Psalms out of tune are harsh to the ear; disagreement of heart is much more to the Spirit of God.

7. Surely when God hath done so much for us, it must be acknowledged to be our duty, to study what sacrifice would be best pleasing to him; some sacrifice we must offer: If there be any more acceptable to him then other, surely he deserves it no. If a friend had done some real kindness for you, you would be glad to know what might be most gratefull to him, wherein you might testify your thankfulness: Is this in your hearts? Do you now say, Oh that we did but know what is the thing that would be most pleasing to God; what sacrifice would smell sweetest in his nostrils! The Lord knowes we would fain offer it, whatsoever it be. I will tell you, That we would lay aside our divisions, our forwardness, that we would abase on our contentious and strife, that we would put on the bowels of mercies, kindnesse, humblenesse of minde, meekenesse, long-suffering, forbearing one another, forgiving one another; If any man hath a quarrell against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye, Col. 3. 12. And 1 Pet. 3. 4. A meeke and a quiet spirit is in the sight of God of great price, it is much set by, παρακελεκλης. Psal. 15. 17. The sacrifice of God, that which is in stead of all sacrifices, is a broken spirit. Our hearts have been broken one from another in our unhappy divisions, oh that now they could could break one towards another in love and tenderness! Here would be a sacrifice more esteemed of God, then thousands of Rams, and ten thousand Rivers of Oyle: Loving mercy, and walking humbly is preferred above such sacrifices, Micah 6. 8.

8ly. God might have soder'd us together by the fire of his wrath; he might have made our blood to have been our cement to have joyned our flinty hearts together; but it is otherwise, God seeks to draw us to himselfe, and one to another by the cords of love, the allurings of his mercy.

9thly, what can have that power to take off the four-ness of mens spirits like mercy; the mercy of a God? surely if any thing possibely can sweeten them, that must needs do it.
We read 1 Sam. 11. 11, 12, 13. a notable experiment of the efficacy of mercy to sweeten mens hearts. After Saul had slain the Ammonites, some of the boisterous spirits would have had him to have slain those who formerly had rejected him; but mark Sauls answer, ver. 13. There shall not a man be put to death this day: Why? For this day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel. Though Saul at another time was a man of a harsh and cruell spirit, yet now mercy sweetens him; that which he was one day by the sense of mercy, that should we be not only in the day of our Thanksgiving, but in the course of our lives.
When salvation came to the house of Zachem, O what a sweet temper was he in! Behold, halfe of my goods I give to the poore, and if I have wronged any one, I restore foure-fold. Salvation is this day come to the Kingdome, O that all we had hearts to say, If wee have wronged any, wee will restore; if wee have wronged any in their names, by word, or writing, any way, we will restore: Mercy and love calls for mercy and love; if we were in a right tune, there would be a sympathy between the bowels of God and ours; as in two Lutes, if the string in one be wound up to be answerable to the other, if you then strike one string, the other will move though lying at a dis-ance: Now Gods love, Gods bowels move, let our love, our bowels move answerably.

10. God shews that he can owne us notwithstanding all our infirmities: Was ever Kingdome in a more distempered condition then ours hath been of late? and yet the Lord hath owned owned us: Why should not we own our Brethren, notwithstanding their infirmities? Why should our divisions cause us to call off one another, seeing our divisions from God hath not provoked him to call us off?

11. Is it not in our desires, that this great Victory might be pursued, that it might not be lost, as others (in great part) have been? Surely it cannot be pursued better, then to take this advantage of it, to unite our selves more together then ever we have done. This would strike as great a terror into the hearts of our Adversaries as the victory hath done.

Lastly, we had need take heed of breaches, let God should be provoked to change his administrations toward us; if there be so much choller in the stomack, that sweet meats are turned into choller, it were just with God to come with bitter and sour pills to purge out our choller. We read Jude, ver. 5. The Lord saved the people out of the land of Egypt, yet afterward he destroyed them that believed not; the Lord hath granted us a great salvation from our Enemies, who would have brought us into Egyptian bondage. We have been singing the song of Moses, we have been praising God according to that, Apoc. 15.3, but let us take heed that yet God be not provoked against us, for we are not out of all danger; as they by not believing, so we by not agreeing, but contending and quarrelling may at last be destroyed. You know how the Lord of that servant to whom 1000 talents were given, took it, that he should presently go to his fellow-servant who ought him but a hundred pence, and lay hands on him, and take him by the throat, and say, Pay that thou owest, and cast him into prison, Mat. 18.28. If men be not mollified by this mercy, they will be hardened, they will use their brethren worse then they did before, the rather, because they would declare to all the world, that they make no such interpretation of this mercy, as that God would have them have further tender regard towards, to seek union and peace with, to beare with or yeeld unto their Brethren more then before; it is not unlikely but temptation may be suggested to do some ait the more against them, either now or within a while, to wipe away any conceit of any such an interpretation of this gracious work of God for us. But those who are of gracious & peaceable spirits, should take the hint.
hint of this, and goe to all they know, who have been at distance one from another, of whom they may have hope to doe good, and seek to mollifie their spirits, to know what it is they have one against another, what prejudices, what hard thoughts have been entertained by them, and by all meanes they are able to remove them, that so we loving & delighting in one another, the Lord may love us, and delight in us, and shew mercy to us yet more and more.

CHAP. XIX.

The fifth Dividing Distemper (Rigidenesse;) the sixth, Rashnesse, the seventh, Wilfulnesse; the eight, Unconstancy.

Rigid, harsh, sowre, crabbed, rough-hewn spirits are unfit for union; there is no sweetnes, no amiableness, no pleasingness in them, they please themselves in a rugged austerity, but are pleasing to none else in all their ways; they will abate nothing of their own, nor yeeld any thing to others: this is against the rule of the Apostle, Rom. 15. 1, 2, 3.

We must not please our selves, but let every one please his Neighbour for his good to edification; and this, according to the example of Christ, who pleased not himselfe. This is the duty not of weake men only, who had need please others, because they have need of others, but ver. 1. those that are strong ought not to please themselves, but seek to please others: Men who are of austerne spirits affecting a gravity which turns to a dull, sullen, sternnesse, they think it to be the commendations of the strength of their spirits, that they can carry themselves as they doe towards others, seeking altogether content to themselves without any yeeldableness to others; no, that is but lightnesse and weakness in men, they are of a more fair and strong temper then to do so: These men by their wisdome do very much finn against the wisdome of the holy Ghost in this Scripture; yea, and against the example of Jesus Christ, who as in his whole course manifested tenderness, gentleness, amiableness, amiableness towards weak ones, who were infinitely beneath him, and here is set forth unto us to be one who pleased not himself, far from this rigid harsh temper: Those words are not of the best tempered metal who will not bend but stand stiff, but such as yeald and bend with worst ease, and stand fraught again; neither are those dispositions the best, who are the stiffest; but such as are most yealdable, and yet stand fraught too. This harsh and rigid spirit makes mens gifts and graces to be very unuseful. When Plato saw Xenocrates of an austere rigid temper, he advised him to sacrifice to the Graces, that he might have more mildness, fearing that otherwise his parts and learning would be unprofitable. The Jews observe upon Exo. 25. 3. That no Iron was in the fluffe of the Tabernacle; rigid iron spirits are very unfit for Church work. Levit. 17. 7. They shall no more sacrifice to Devils: The word translated Devils, signifies rough ones; Devils had their names from thence; this is the name of a Satyr, Isa. 34. 14. The rough one. The Spirit of God is a Dove-like sweet spirit, but the spirit of the Devill is a rough harsh spirit, the spirit of a Satyr. Prov. 11. 17. He that is cruel, troubleth his owne flesh. That word here translated cruell, the Septuagint elsewhere translates it by a word that signifies rigid, stifte, sepebs, Jer. 30. 14. Men of such tempers are very troublesome to themselves, to their families, to all with whom they converse: If a Smith would joyn two pieces of iron, he must first file them, or beat them smooth: If the Joyner would joyn two pieces of wood, he must plain them: Except our spirits be filed, beaten smooth, or plained, they are unfit for joyning.

The sixth dividing Distemper, Rashness.

Acts 19. 36. Ye ought to be quiet, and do nothing rashly. Doing things rashly, and quietnesse, are opposed.

1. Rashness makes men engage themselves suddenly in businesse, before they have examined it well: This causes much trouble, for if a man be engaged he lies under a temptation to goe on in it: As 2 Chron. 25. 9. When the man of God came to Amaziah, to take him off from a businesse he was engaged in; O but saies he, what shall I do for the hundred Talents I have given out already? thus many answer to the truth of God that would would take them off from what they are engaged in, but what shall I do for my credit that lies engaged?

2ly. Rashness is causes men suddenly to provoke others; whereas did they consider what ill consequences might come of it, they would forbear. Rash men quickly take hold of the sword of Justice to hack and hew; they think that what they do is according to reason: but they do not wisely weigh things in the balance of Justice. Remember, Justice hath a Ballance as well as a Sword. Prov. 29. 11. A fool uttereth all his mind. The Sept. translate it ὄμη, utters all his anger. Rash fools by uttering their anger, suddenly cause great strife and trouble where ever they come. The Hebrew word that signifies a fool, and that which signifies suddenly, rashly, is from the same root.

3ly. When peace sometimes is even concluded, and there is great joy in hope of a comfortable agreement, rashness will suddenly break it without any due consideration.

O that that promise Isa. 52. 4. were fulfilled among us. The heart of the rash shall understand knowledge. Rash men think they presently understand all that is knowable in such a businesse, and thence presume to make sudden determinations; but as over-hasty digestion causes wind, and brings much trouble to the body; so over-hasty resolutions to mens spirits and to societies.

The seventh Dividing Distemper, Wilfulness.

Think I may say in most men, Will is the axletree, lust and passions are the wheels, whereupon almost all their actions are carried: Where there is much will, though the thing be little about which men contend, yet the opposition may be great; as a little stone thrown with a strong arm, may take deep impression. It is a dangerous thing to have men's wills engaged in matters of difference, it is easier to deal with twenty men's reasons, then with one man's will: A man of a wilfull stout spirit, stands as a flake in the midst of a stream, lets all passe by him, but he stands where he was; What hope can there be of union, where there will be no yielding? one man's will will raise another, fet will to will they may dash one against another, but not like to close, to get into one another.
A wilful man thinks it is beneath a wise man to alter his way;
yea, it may be he thinks it a dishonour to the truth, that both he, his profession, and the honour of God shall suffer by it; when a stubborn self-willednes is taken for a right constancy and setlednesse, it is very strong in men; but let us take heed of this, it is no matter though we go back from our former assertions, so long as we go forward to the truth. Luther was called an Apostate; I am so, says he, but it is from errour to truth. Many times stoutnesse of spirit comes from weakenesse rather then strengthe; there is not always the greatest strength of judgment where there is the greatest strength of will: As a mans judgment that is without prejudice is very strong, so a mans prejudice that is without judgment is as strong: The dullest horses are not always the most easily reigned. I know and am perswaded, says the Apostle, Rom. 14.14. many men are perswaded before they know; those who are perswaded before they know, wil not be perswaded to know. Mens wills will not suffer their understandings to consider; if they doe consider, they will not suffer them to be convinced; if they be convinced, they will not suffer them to acknowledge that they are convinced.

It is dishonest for a man not to give in his Bond when the debt is paid; so for a man not to acknowledge himselfe convinced, but stand out against the truth, though his conscience tells him it is made clear to him. Let men lay down their wills, and there will be no hell, sayes Bernard: So say I, take away mens wills, and contentions will cease. Scaliger tells us, the nature of some kind of Amber is such, that it will draw to it self all kind of stalks of any herbe, except Basliske, an Herbe called Capitallis, because it makes men heady, filling their brains with black exhalations: Thus those who by the fumes of their corrupt wills, are grown headstrong, will not be drawn by that which draws others.

But this charging men of willfulness is presently catched hold of, in an abusive way; if men will not yeeld to what some conceive to be right, presently they are charged with willfulness and stubbornnesse, they do not see because they will not see;
fee; they are not convinced, because they will not. We who differ so much from others in things that others think to be clear, should take heed how we charge others of willfulness who differ from us: As it is dishonest not to give in the bond when the debt is paid, so it is a cheat to require the bond before the debt be satisfied: Men may think, and give out, they have done enough to convince men, when indeed upon examination, it will be found to be nothing, or far short of satisfying the reasons that are against it if they were their own.
But when a man may have peace in his conscience, that what he holds or does, is not through willfulness, but constancy of his love to the truth, I shall speak to presently.

The 8. dividing Distemper. Unconstancy.

If a man had an art to change his face every day, to seem sometimes white, sometimes black, sometimes ruddy, sometimes pale, sometimes hairy, sometimes smooth, sometimes old, sometimes young, how unfit were such a man for society?
this which men cannot do in their faces, they doe in the unconstancy of their spirits: As our affections and determinations must not be like the Persian Decrees, to admit of no alteration, so neither must they be such as the Polonian laws are, wch
(they say) last but 3. days: When a thing is so brittle, that it breaks as soon as you meddle with it, how can you make it joy'n? there must be some constancy in that wch you would fa-ten to another thing; when mens spirits are so fickle, that a man cannot tell where to find them, how can there be a close?
O how much are men now differing from themselves, in what their thoughts of men and carriage towards them have been, though the men concerning whom they thus differ remain the same they were, yea the same they appeared to be long since, there was sweet agreement in affection, loving embraces!
rejoycing in the presence of one another, and yet nothing is known in those from whom their hearts, countenances and ways are alienated, &c. more than formerly was: not difference in judgment, that was known before: Such a change of appeared, as never appeared in any age since the world began. A great deal of still there hath been more then formerly, & yet what are these men other wise then they have bin many years since? Were I to speak to wicked men, to charge them of the unconftancy of their spirits, I would make use of that similitude I have out of Epiphanius, who speaking of the Jews deliring the coming of the Messias, but when he was come, they hated him, They were ( says hee ) in this like mad dogs, who first glaver upon men, and then bite and devour them. But because I speak to many of the Saints, I had rather use a softer expression, more futable to the honour that is due to godly men; I compare them in their unconftancy towards their brethren which hath caufed so great division, to the sweetneffe of the ayr in a fair sun-shine morning, oh how does it delight the traveller when he goeth forth! and truly such were the serene countenance of our brethren towards us, but within a while the clouds over-caft, the sky looks lowring, gufts of wind arise, yea thunder-bolts of terrible words flye about our ears, and the flashes of their anger strike upon our faces.

Tantæ ne animís célestibus iræ.

Unconftancy is evil, and a cause of division: Stoutnesse is evil, and a cause of division: A man must not be one thing one day, and another another day; not like a weather-cock, carried up and down with every wind; neither must he be wilfull and stout, not like a ruddy lock that will not be stirred by any key. Now then, how shall we know when a man is neither fickle nor stout? For except some rules of discerning be given, this temptation may be before me, I must not be fickle, unsettled, and unconftant, I will therefore stiffly stand to maintain what I have professed.

You may know whether your ficklenesse be avoyded by true settled constancy of spirit, or by stoutnesse, by these five notes:

First, true constancy and settlednesse of spirit is got by much prayer and humiliation before the Lord; Establish me Lord with thy free spirit, unite my heart to feare thy Name. When after thy heart-breakings and meltings, and heart-cryings and pourings forth, Lord shew mee what thy will is in this thing, keep mee from miscarrying, let me not settle upon any errour instead of the notes.

Anfw.

I.

How to know whether we avoid our ficklenesse by true constancy, or by stoutnesse: five notes.
the truth, but what is thy truth fasten my soul in it, that what ever temptations come, I may never be taken off from it. Tell God in Prayer what the thing is, and what hath perverted thy heart to embrace it, open thy heart fully to God in all thy aimes; and if by this means the heart be fixed, now it is delivered from fickleness, and not fall into fickleness.

21st. Where true constancy is attained by the Spirit of God, and not by the fickleness of thine owne, there is exercise of much grace, and growing up in grace, as faith, humility, love, meekness, patience, &c. 1 Pet. 3. 17, 18. Take heed ye fall not from your fastening, but grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Hearts stout and wilfull are dry and fapless.

31st. If the more a man hath to do with God, the more set-led he is in his way; when he hath the most full converse and sweetness of communion with God, he is then the most fully settled, satisfied, established in such a truth, which he before conceived to be of God.

Many men are very fiffe and wilful, unmoving when they have to deal with men, they seem then to be the most confident men in the world; but God knows, and their consciences know, when they solemnly set themselves in the presence of God, and have the most real sight of God, and have to deal most immediately with him, then they have most giving thoughts, they have fears that things may not prove so sure as they bore others in hand; they apprehended them to be;
But if God's presence and thy dealings with him confirms thee in this, thy conscience may give thee an assurance, that as thou art not sickle and wavering, so not stout and wilfull.

41st. When there is a proportion in mens constancie, if a man be resolute and constant in one thing, but very sickle and easily turned aside in others, there is cause to suspect his constancy is rather from stitleness than from grace; for grace works proportionably through the whole soul, and in the whole course of a mans life.

51st. If the more real the presence of death and judgment appear to a man, the more settled he is in that way; this likewise may be a good evidence to him, that his settledness in such a way, is right.

C H A P.

Envy, strife, railings, evill surmisings, 1 Tim. 6. 4. Strife and evill surmisings are neer of kin. If contentious men can get nothing against their brethren, they will surmise there is something; if they can find nothing in their actions to judge, they will judg their hearts; if there be nothing above-board, they will think there may be something under-board; & from thinking there may be something, they will think it is very likely there is something; and from likely there is, they will conclude there is. Surely there is some plot working. But this is against the law of Love, for it thinketh no evil; all the good that they see in their Brethren, is blasted by their suspition of evil. Love would teach us rather by what appears not, then by what appears not to judg the worst of what appears not, then by what appears not to judg the worst of what appears. Suspition is like some jelly stuffe that is got between the joynts; if the bone be out of joynt, and any jelly be got in, though it be but a little soft stuffe, it will hinder the setting of the bone. I confess in these times, because we have been so extreamly deceived in those who have been us'd in publike place, in whom we so much confided, there is a great deal of reason that we should be very wary of men, and believe (till we have very good grounds of confidence) with trembling. I remember Melchior Adam in the life of Bucholce-rus, tells of a witty counfel of his to his friend Hubnerus, who being to goe to the Court to teach the Prince Electors children, at their parting, I will give you, says he, one profitable rule for your whole life, he listenning what it should be: I commend (faith he) to you the faith of the Devils: At which Hubnerus wondering, Take heed (faies he) how you trust any at the Court, beleive their promises but warily, but with feare: you may feare they will never come to any thing. But in the mean time while we are thus fearful of one another, while we cannot trust one another, we cannot joyn one with another. I have read of Cambyses, he did but dream his brother should be King of Persia, and he put him to death. Many amongst us do but dream of men, with whom our hearts are not, that they have some plots working, and how do our spirits work against them? Groundlesse jealousies arise from much baseness in our own hearts. Those who have no principle of faithfulness in themselves, are suspicious of every one; but as for those who suffer carelessly, in this thing let them be of good comfort; God will reward them good for what evil they suffer. We read Numb. 5. 28. that if a man were jealous of his wife, so that he brought her to the tryall by drinking the water of jealousy; if she were clear, she should not only be freed from hurt by that water, but she should conceive seed, if she went barren before, the Lord would recompence her sorrow and trouble shee suffered by her husbands suspicion of her. And Paulus Fagius upon the place, says, the Jews had a tradition, not only that she should conceive, but it should be a man-child; if shee had any disease, she should be freed; and if she brought forth before with difficulty, she should bring forth now with ease. Let not men therefore who are of publike use, having their consciences clear, yet because they are under suspicion, throw off all in an anger: Such a temptation many lye under, but let them know, this temptation cannot prevail but upon the distemper of their hearts, the exceeding sinfull frowardnesse of their spirits; they should trust God with their names, their esteem, their honour, and go on in their work. The only way to deliver themselves from suspicion, is their constant industry and faithfulness in all opportunities of service God puts into their hands, and with the more quietnesse of spirit, with the lesse noyse they go on, the sooner will the suspicions they were under, wash off and vanish to nothing, God will make their names break forth as the light; those weeds having no ground to take root, will wither and dye away.

The tenth dividing Distemper, A spirit of contention.

As in some there is a strong inclination, a vehement imperious to whoredom, which the Prophet calls a spirit of whoredom, so there is in others a vehement strong disposition of heart heart to contention; these have a spirit of contention; these are like Salamanders, who love, and live in the fire. They thirst after the waters of Massah and Meribah, their temper is such, as if they drank no other drink then what was brewed of those waters; Contentions and strifes, that are as tedious to other men as death, are their delight; they are most in their element when they are over head and ears in them. A contentious spirit will always find matter for contention. Prov. 26. 21. As coals to burning coals, and wood to fire, so is a contentious man to kindle strife; they are ready to put their hands to any strife they meet with; yet Prov. 26. 17. Hee that medleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that holdeth a dog by the eares. Many men have no mettal in any thing but contentions; like many jades who are dull in travell, they have mettal only to kick and to play jadifh tricks.

If thou haft any spirit, any zeal and courage, it is pitty it should be laid out in quarrels; reserve it for the cause of God, to strengthen thee in contending for the truth & the publike.

The eleventh Distemper, Covetousnesse.

This is the root of all evil, then of this; there is no greater plague to friendship, then desire of money, sayes Laelius apud Cicer. A covetous man is witty to foresee wayes of gaine, and he is stiffe in holding fast what may be for his advantage. Yet know what a stire Demetrius and his fellows made in Ephesus when their profit was endangered, they had rather set all in a tumult then let their gain go. 1 Tim. 4. 5. Envy, strife, railing, &c. perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, destitute of the truth, supposing that gaine is godlinesse. How will some object against men, & withdraw from them, deprive themselves of the benefits of the gifts of God in them, of much good they have heretofore acknowledged they have got by them, & all meely to save their purses, & that in a poor pedling way? What a stire hath this Meum and Toum made in the world? The sweetnesse of gaine amongst men is like honey cast amongst Beares, they will fight, rend and tear out one anothers throat for it. They that will be eich, fall into temptations and a snare, and and into many and hurtfull lusts, 1 Tim. 6.9, 10. They pierce themselves and others too with many sorrows.

When divisions arose in Germany, upon Luther's Doctrine, men of base covetous spirits, judging Luther by themselves, thought that Luther made all this stir to get gaine; Why therefore, layes one, do you not stop the manis mouth with gold or silver? Another answers, Oh, this German Beast cares not for money.

The twelfth dividing distemper, Falseness.

Nothing more firmly unites and holds together the Common-wealth then fidelity, layes Cicero. Truth is a girdle. Stand therefore, having your loynes girt with truth, Ephes. 6. 14. Truth binds, and Falseness loosens. The Apostle, Eph. 4. 25. exhorts to put away lying, and every man to speak truth to his neighbour, upon this ground, because we are members one of another. The Romans esteemed so much of truth for uniting men into societies, that they built a Temple to it, as to a Goddesse; in which Temple all Leagues, Covenants, Truces, and important bargains were made, which were so religiously observed, that who soever broke them, was held for a cursed, damned creature, unfit for humane society. Rom. 1. 29. Full of envy, murther, debate, deceit, malignity. A man were better be true to false principles, then be false to true ones. Those who are false, are also mischievous: they care not what mischief they do to any, so they may but uphold themselves, and repair that credence which formerly they had, but now through their base falseness is crackt; and if they have wronged any by their falseness, they seek to keep such downe, if not to ruine them, fearing lest their falseness should hereafter be revenged: and if they cannot get them down by force, they will seek to do it by adding yet more falseness, by flattering them whom their hearts hate, and would gladly ruine. That Scripture, Prov. 26. 28. is very remarkable for this, A lying tongue bateth those that are afflicted by it; and a flattering mouth worketh ruine. Psal. 72. 14. He shall deliver their soule from deceit and violence. If men who are false cannot compasse their ends ends by deceit, they will seek to do it by violence: God hath his time to deliver his Saints from both. Come Lord Jesus, come quickly.

CHAP. XXI.

Dividing Practices. The first, The Practice of the Tongue.

The second, Needlest Disputes.

Rovoking bitter language, is a great divider: An evil tongue in Scripture is compared to swords, Arrowes, Razors, to poyson of Aspes, fire, yea to the fire of hell, which sets all the world on fire, to wild beasts; it is an unruly member that cannot be tamed. When a Philosopher saw two women of ill fame talking together, he said, By this speech the Aspe takes in poyson from the Viper, which it seems was a proverbial speech in Tertullian time; he inveighing against Marcion the Heretique, Let the Heretique, sages he, cease borrowing poyson from the Jew, according to the Proverbe, the Aspe from the Viper.

Many men of moderate spirits, if let alone, yet meeting with men who tell them stories, and speak ill of those men that heretofore they had a good opinion of, yet now before they have examined what the truth is, there is a venome got into their spirits before they are aware, their hearts begin to be hot, and to rise against those men they hear such things of, their thoughts are altered concerning them, their spirits alienated, breaches are made, and men who are innocent wonder from whence all comes. O take heed of these men of evil tongues, especially at your tables, for while you are warme with mirth and good cheer, you are in greater danger to take downe the discourse of such as are at table with you, some poyson may get into your spirits, and you not think of it. Saint Augustine could not endure such guests at his table; he caused therefore these two verses to be writ over his Table, it were well they were over some of yours.

To
To speak ill of the absent forbear.
Or else sit not at Table here.

But if men of evill tongues doe so much hurt to men of moderate spirits, what hurt doe they doe one to another? when two or three, or more of them meet together, having all of them bitter spirits and evill tongues, what hot burning venome doe they infuse one into another, inflaming one another with malice? That proverbial speech, ὅπις ἐὰν φαγή, ὅπις δεδεχόμεν ζηνήσεται, is true of these men; if one Serpent did not eate another, there would bee no Dragon; by taking in one anothers poyson, they grow to bee fiery Dragons, flying up and downe from place to place with their fiery figtins.

Destroy, O Lord, and divide their tongues, for I have seen violence and strife in the City, Psal. 45 9. The same letters in the Hebrew word that is to signify verbum a word, is also for pestis, the plague; an evill tongue hath the pestilence in it.

The whisperings of an evill tongue causes divisions, Rom. 1. 29. Full of envy, debate, malignity, whisperers, 2 Cor. 12. 20. Debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, whisperings. Many of sidling, paltry dispositions, goe up and downe whispering, they speak very secretely to you, you must tell no body by any means, and yet themselves tell it to a second, a third, a tenth, and any one they meet with, with whom they desire to ingratiate themselves, and to every body they speak, yet still they must tell no body; they doe not love to be brought forth as the authors, they tell you as a friend, what they heare; and thus carrying tales up and downe in a secret way, they doe what in them lyes to blast the names of their Brethren; jealousies, suspicion, envyings, displeasure, anger is raised, and the parties against whom all this is wonder what is the matter, they being no ways conscious to themselves of any miscarriage towards such from whom they finde such strange carriage; at last some nibling whispering Mouse is found to be the cause of all.

These whispering Tale-bearers have such an art, as to cause what they thus speake in secret to sinke very deeply into mens hearts: They profess themselves very sorry for what they tell you, but it is too true, and with a deep sigh they mischiefe their Neighbour; _Et sic cum vultu masto procedit maledictio._ Bern.

But let men take heed of them, for they strike, they wound them as much, if not more, then they doe those against whom they speak, for they know nothing of it; and though they suffer, yet they doe not sinne; but you may not only be troubled, and that causelessly (it may be) and for nothing lose the sweetness of your love to your friend, and the enjoyment of his to you; but withall, you may entertain sinne into your heart, and so be wounded. Prov. 18:8. The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, and they goe downe into the innermost parts of the belly, beware therefore of such. Prov. 20. 19. He that goeth about as a tale-bearer revealeth secrets, therefore meddle not with him that flattereth with his lippes. Hee may come glauering, and fawning, and smiling to you, as if he accounted you a speciall friend, and therefore would not tell every body; but meddle not with him; if you shall hug and embrace him, you have received a wound even in the innermost parts of the belly. Prov. 26. 20. Where no wood is, there the fire goeth out; so where there is no tale-bearer the strife ceaseth.

Prov. 16. 28. A whisperer separeth chiefe friends. Those who have lived in entire friendship many yeares, sometime by some whispering woman, have their hearts very much estranged, the beauty of their friendship darkened, and the sweetness of it almost lost.

Whispering tale-bearing tongues is the cause of strife, take heed of it: And so is a cenfuring tongue: I can compare this to nothing better then to a candle, whose tallow is mixed with brine, as soone as you light it, it spits up and down the room: Thus many have salt brine in their spirits, which when they get a little knowledge, they spit here and there in hard and bitter censures, which are exceedingly provoking to the spirits of men; though the censures should prove true, yet the mixture of so much salt brine in them, cannot but exasperate & cause mens hearts to fret; but much more if they prove to be meere flanderers. Jer. 9. 4. Take ye heed every one of his neighbour, and trust ye not in any brother, for every brother will utterly supplant, and every neighbour will walke with flanders; and c. 6 28. They are all grievous revolters, walking with flanders; they are brasse and iron, they are all corrupters. And yet more if this be a raging tongue,

Hos. 7. 16. Their Princes shall fall by the sword, for the rage of their tongue. Discontents rise high, first by too much liberty of the tongue, then higher, by the bitterness of it; but when it comes to the rage of it, by this many times they rise so high, that great men, yea Princes come to fall by the sword. There is a story in the Tripartite History of a Christian who professed he had beene seven and thirty yeares learning that lesson, Psal. 39. 1. I said I will take heed to my wayes, that I offend not in my tongue, and yet had not learned it. I feare there are many amongst us who have beene Professors these feven and thirty yeares, and yet have not learned this lesson; notwithstanding the Scripture faith, If a man brideth not his tongue, hee deceiveth his owne heart, this mans Religion is in vaine, James 1. 26.

The second dividing practice, Needleffe Disputes.

When men have got a little knowledge, they thinke it a fine thing to be arguing and disputing in matters of Religion: unnecessary disputes are their necessary practice, for otherwise they shalbe accounted as no body, if they have not something to object against almost every thing, but in this way of theirs, they shal bee accounted knowing men, men who have an insight into things, who understand more then ordinary men doe: hence they turne all their Religion into disputes, and by them they grow giddie. Wine is good when it goes to the heart to cheere it, but when it fumes all up into the head, it makes it giddy. Knowledge is good when the strength of it gets to the heart to comfort it, there to breed good spirits, for the strengthening it in the waies of holinesse; but when it flies up all into the head, it fills it with thousands of phansies; it causes pride and giddinesse. Disputes draw the best spirits from the heart, by which it weakens it. It is a very ill figne in a man to have a contradicting spirit, to get into a veine of disputing against any thing, though it be good. I have read of Gregory Nazianzen, that he told his friends that Julian would prove to be a notorious wicked man, he gave this reason, Because he tooke such delight in disputing against that which was good.
Disputes are feldome without much heart-distemper; if they continue continue long, they cause snarling one at another; and no marvaile though those who snarle so often, doe bite at last. A man fhews most parts in the matter of truth, but most grace in the manner of handling it with reverence, holinesse and modesty.
Rom. 14.1. Receive not the weake in faith to doubtfull disptations.
Here is a direct injunction against those disputes I am speaking of. Let no man say every truth is precious, the least truth is more worth then our lives, we must contend for every truth.

The least truth is so precious, that we must rather lose our lives, then deny it; you must doe and suffer much to maintaine truth, but this in an orderly way.

First, you must be grounded in the maine Fundamentalls of Religion; you must be strong in the faith, and after that labour to edifie your selves in all the truths of God, so as one may be helpfull to another. It is not for every one who hath but little time, little knowledge, little meanes, little fitrength, to trye out himselfe and others in doubtfull disputes. The Scripture is so much against this, as nothing can be more. 1 Tim. 1. 4. Which minifter questions rather then edifying. To ask, and discource of queftions about the great things that concerne thy soule, thy eternall estate, how thou maist live further to the honour of God, is good, when you meet together; to confer one with another what God hath done for your soules, to tell each other the experiences of your owne hearts, and Gods dealings with you, what temptations ye meet with, and how God helps you against them; such things as these would edifie. But when your queftions are about things that you are never like to understand, and if you did understand, they little concerne you, they would not be helpfull to you one whit in the wayes of godlinesse, these the holy Ghost would not have you spend your time in. Eccles.
7.29. Man was made upright and he hath found out to himselfe may inventions, Miscuerit se infinitis questionibus, so the old Latine reads it, he hath mingled himselfe in infinite questions. If we had but that great queftion more amongst us, What shall we do to be saved? it would cause many unprofitable questions to vanish. Never such ignorance came upon the Christian world, as in that age when the Schoolmen were in the highest esteeme;
all Religion then was turned into Questions; both the mystery and the power of godlinesse was lott. The things of Religion are rather to be believed, then disputed. We believe Fishermen, not Logitians, sayes Ambrose. The Devil, at this day seekes to darken the glory of Religion this way; he sees that in regard so much light hath broke forth he cannot get men presently off it by prophaneness, therefore he labours to eat out the strength of it by busying them, and getting them to delight in multitudes of questions, and that about things of lesser concernment.

1 Tim. 6. 4. Hee is proud, and knoweth nothing, but doing about questions, and strife of words, whereof commeth envie, strife, sailings, evil surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt mindes, and destitute of the truth. These men concet they have more knowledge then other men, but the holy Ghost saies they know nothing; they cry out much of the truth, and they contend for the trutth, but the holy Ghost saies they are destitute of the truth. 2 Tim. 2. 22, 23. Follow charity, peace, but foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they doe gender strifes, but the servant of the Lord must not strive. And Titus 3. 8, 9. This is a faithful saying, these things I will that thou affirm constantely, that they which have beleved in God, might be careful to maintaine good works; these things are good and profitable unto men, but avoid foolish questions, and Genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the Law, for they are unprofitable and vain.

The question about the Law, whether a man be justified by it, or by free grace in Christ, this is not one of those foolish questions and needless strivings, this is a great question, this we are to contend for, our life is in it, but there are other questions about the Law, which cause strivings rather then edifying, as whether the Law be a rule for our lives, as it was given by Moses; that we are bound to doe what is required in the Law, this is generally acknowledged, as to love God, not worship Images, &c. but whether we be bound to doe it as it was the Law delivered by Moses upon Mount Sina, this question troubles many mens heads; that we are bound to doe the same things as they are delivered by Christ in the hand of that Mediator, is acknowledged by any that understand themselves in any measure. Now then let these two things be granted about the Law; First, that we are not justified by it, but by the free grace of God in Christ: Secondly, that what duties of holiness are set downe in the Law, we are bound to them by the most strong obligations: what neede we contend further about the Law? Let us be established in these two, and it will be sufficient for our edifying; It is like when Paul wrote this Epistle to Titus, the heads of the people were troubled about some such kinde of questions about the Law, as are amongst us; therefore sayes he, Avoid foolish questions, and strivings about the Law. But now the questions about the Law are driven on to such a dangerous issue, that we have cause not only to be careful to avoid them, but even to tremble at the thought of them. It is now accounted a legall thing against the grace of the Gospel to confeffe fin, to be humbled for fin, to make conscience of duty, or to be troubled in conscience for neglect of it; No, they thank God they are delivered from such things, in respect of God, whether they fin or not it is all one: yea these things prevail against those who have beene forward in profession of Religion, who seemed to walke strightly, now are growne loose.

That faith is easily wrought, which teacheth men to beleive well of themselves, though their lives be ill. There is a mighty change in mens spirits now from that which was heretofore; Times have been when any opinion that tended to loosenesse, was presently distasted as unfavoury, and rejected by such, who made profession of Religion.

Sleidan in the tenth book of his Commentaries, sayes, The Devil that sought to doe mischiefe at Murther was not a skillfull Devill, but rude and simple, because he sought to prevaile by tempting men to loosenesse; whereas, sayes he, if he had beene a cunning Devill, he would rather have deceived by abstaining from flesh, by abhoring Matrimony, by shewes of wonderfull lowliness of minde, &c. he might sooner have taken men this way; but truly now the most cunning Devill sees it to be the best way to attaine his ends, to raise up and foment opinions that tend to the liberty of the flesh, so be it he can carry them on under the colour of magnifying free grace; he findes that these things are exceeding suitable to mens spirits in these times, that they are taken in by such who formerly appeared so conscientious, that hee feared hee should never have beene able to have prevailed with them; hee never found a way like to this to prevaile with such men; yea, never a way like to this to choake.
choake the Word, when it first begins to worke upon the heart; he hath blasted more young seeming converts this way, then ever hee did by any way since he was a Devill: Heretofore the way was to stirre up others to deride them for following the Word, and for praying; now he hath a way worth two of that, to make them to deride others for their conscienciousnesse in following the Word and praying, and this strengthened with a high perfwasion, that hereby they are the great magnifiers of the free grace of God in the Gospel, the only men who understand the Gospel way. This Devill now looks upon himselfe and his fellowes as simple and foolish in all their former devices, here is an experiment beyond them all, seeing this Christ must needs be magnified, hee will magnifie him too; seeing the Gospel must goe on, hee will put it on too, hee will finde out a device here, to strike at the practice, power, life of godlinesse, in a more secret and prevailing way then ever formerly was done; it is like in this generation the former principles of godlinesse will not be got out; but if this way prevails still in proportion to what it hath done, in a generation or two it is like to bring generall prophanenesse and licentiousnesse upon the face of the Christian world more then any way of Satan ever did since the world began, for here is a way to be loose and prophan, and to satisfie Conscience too.

C H A P. XXII.

The third Dividing Practice, Men no keeping within the bounds that God hath set them.

First, when men will be medling with that whith concerns them not, that is out of their sphere. 1 Thel. 4. 11. Study to be quiet, and doe your owne businesse. Prov. 20. 31. It is an honour for a man to cease from strife, but every fool will be medling. Choller in the gall is usefull to the body, but if it overflow, the body growes into distemper presently; we may be all usefull in our places, if we keepe to them, contenting our selves with the improvements of our talents in them; thus both our selves and others may have quiet. When Mannah was gathe- red and kept in that proportion God would have it, it was very good; but when men must have more, and keep it longer then God would have them, then it breeds worms. Thus it will be in all that we have; or doe; let us keepe our proportion God sets us, and all will be well; but if we thinke to provide better for our selves by going beyond our measure, worms are presently bred in all.

But especially where men will not keepe within their bounds in their power over others; for what is all our contestation at this time? it is not about mens stretching their power beyond their line both in State and Church? From whence are our State-divisions, our Warres, but because Princes have been persuaded their power was boundlesse? at least not to be kept within those bounds the State fayes it ought to bee. They think there is such a distance between them and others, that the estates, liberties, lives of all men within their country lie at their mercy; not considering how they come to be rais’d so high: that what they have above others, is given to them by those above whom they are. No man inheriteth more then was given to his forefathers, and so to him, whereby they might see that they are not limited onely by the lawes of God, but by the lawes of men also, namely, The agreement between them and the people when they are rais’d to such dignities. There is nothing weakens their right more then the pleading it by conquest; Princes have little cause to thank those who plead their right that way. The surest foundation for Princes to set their feet on, is the agreement between the people and them, or their progenitors; but if they will goe beyond this agreement, what Warres, what wofull disturbances doe they make!

Secondly, if either they, or any Governours of the State, shall instead of being helpfull to the government of the Church, take it all from it into their owne hands, in this they goe beyond those bounds Christ would have them; it is by the Civill power that the Governours of the Church have the peaceable exercise of what power Christ hath given them, but they have not their power from them. Civill authority cannot put any spirituall power into a man, or company of men, which they had not before; it can onely protect, encourage, and further the exercise of that power that Christ hath given.
They are inconsiderate men, sayes Calvin, who make Magistrates too spiritual; this evil, sayes he, prevails in Germanie, and in the Countries about us; we finde what fruit growes from this root, namely that those who are in power, thinke themselves so spiritual, that there is no other ecclesiastical government; this sacrilege comes in violently amongst us, because they cannot measure their office within its due bounds.

And for Church-Governours, if they would keep within their Limits, we might enjoy much peace, if first they would assume to themselves no more power then Christ hath given them; Secondly, if they would not extend it over more congregations then Christ hath committed to them; Thirdly, if they would not exercise it in more things then Christ would have them. Let us looke a little into these three, for the want of a right understanding in them hath caused, and may yet further cause much disturbance.

For the first: That Christ hath appointed some to rule in his Church, and that all the members of the Church are not in the office of ruling, is apparent in Scripture, 1 Cor. 12. 28. Rom. 12. 8. but that these Officers, preaching Elders, or others, should so have the sole power of ruling as to doe all in their owne Consistory Classis, or (whatsoever you may call their convening) that the Church should have nothing to doe with their acts of rule but to obey, this is assuming to themselves power beyond what is given them; This hath brought tyrannie into the Church, it hath made the Church-officers to looke upon the rest of the Church in a contemptible way, as the common vulgar sort, men ignorant and weak, not at all fit to meddle with matters of government, not so much as to take cognisance, or give any consent to what the Church-officers doe; But whether they understand or no whether they consent or dissent, it makes no matter, the determinations of those in place must stand, their censures must be submitted to.

Peter Martyr in an Epistle to the Ministers, and such as cum bonimes servent non facile sum aliquod frigus obrepserit, admittetur periculum, aium imminere ne disciplina colore ministri tyrannicendum occipent, excommunicent pro libidine non ascendunt, ii bonimes nihil ministerorum tyrannide posse timeri, ubi evangelii regula servatur in exclusenda fraternitate ecclesiae confensa est adhibendus, suina autem eum auctiorum tyrannide jure potest conspirari. P. Mart. ep. 21.
professed the faith in Polonia, exhorts them to endeavour the establishing of Discipline in the Church as soon as they could, while peoples hearts were heat with love to, and desires after the Gospell, he tells them it will be harder to bring it in afterward, when their hearts begin to grow more cold; and that they might not thinke Discipline a small thing, he sayes, that those Churches cannot be said to professe the Gospell truly nor solidly, which want it; he would have them acknowledge it not to be the least part of Christian Religion, but must know that the Gospel is neglected by such as shall put off from themselves such a singular excellent portion of it. But sayes he, this will be the Objection. Under the colour of Discipline, the Ministers of the Church will tyrannize, they will carry things according to their owne minds.

To this he answers, Tyrannie in the Ministers needs not be feared, where the rule of the Gospel for censures is observed; for in casting out any who will not be reclaimed, the consent of the Church must be had; and if it be done by this authority, none can complain of the tyrannie of a few.

Cyprian in his sixt Epistle proffeseth his resolution to doe nothing without the counsell of the Elders, and consent of the people. Our Brethren of Scotland in their opposition to the Prelates, give very much to the people in the matter of Excommunication: It pertaineth, say they, to the whole Church collectively taken to deny her Christian communion to such wicked persons as adde contumacie to their disobedience, therefore it pertaineth to the whole Church to excommunicate them. Againe, It pertaineth to the whole Church to admit one into her communion, therefore to the whole Church to cast one out of her communion. And a page or two after, The Apostle writing to the whole Church of Corinth, will have them being gathered together, to deliver that incestuous person to Satan, therefore every particular Church or Congregation hath power to excommunicate. There they give many arguments to prove, that the Apostle would not excommunicate by his owne authority alone, but by the authority of the Church, and that collectively taken, (So they say) not the Ministers or Elders of the Church onely.

Let no man say, this was the judgement but of one Minister.
fter, for at the beginning of this Parliament, my selfe, togeth-er with a reverend Brother, asked Master Henderson, two or three of the Ministers of Scotland being with him, Whether we might not take that Book as the judgement of the most godly and able of the Ministers of Scotland, for the matters of Church-discipline? They answered, we might.

The second way of going beyond their limits, is their extending their power to more Congregations then Christ hath given them charge of. The chiefe Church-controversie at this day is about this extent; I shall onely shew you where the difference lyes betweene one and the other in it. The Question is this, Whether one that is set by Christ to take charge of a particular Congregation, as a Pastor to feed them, by Word, Sacraments, and Rule, may keep the Pastorall charge he hath for Word and Sacraments to one Congregation, but his charge for Rule shall extend together with others to an hundred Congregations or more.

Some say that no Minister can have the charge of ruling over people in a larger extent then his charge over them for Word and Sacraments reaches; they thinke that those people that can say to a Minister, That charge that Christ hath given you for Word and Sacraments, extends not to take care of our soules to feed them, therefore you have no charge of our soules for ruling; if you thinke you may, preach or administer Sacraments in an accidentall arbitrary way onely, not as challenging power over us for this, or looking upon us as those committed to you, for whom you are to answer; then at the fartheft you may exercise rule over us but in this way.

But others hold this, That a Minister may answer to this people thus, I confesse I have indeed onely such a particular Congregation to be my flock, and although I being desired to help sometimes in another to preach or administer Sacraments, yet I doe it not as having the charge of their soules as being Pastor to them: But as for that ruling power that Christ hath given me, I conceive by joyning of it with others, it extends to hundreds of Congregations, or more, according as our association shall be, so as we have not onely liberty to be helpfull to those who have the speciall charge of the Congregations, but we have the supreme ruling power in our hands, to challenge in the Name of Christ, to exercise over these Congregations, as we shall see cause. I say, the supreme power above what your Ministers or Elders in your particular Congregations have; for though these Ministers and Elders of yours be admitted to be members of our Court, yet if they all should be of a contrary minde from us, in some matter that concerns your Congregation, we yet will judge and determine, and will censure and exercise all kinde of Ecclesiasticall Jurisdiction in that congregation, as we see cause, though it may be not one of us ever law any of the faces of any of the men of your congregation before. Here, I say, lyes the great dividing controversie, which is right, which is wrong is not my worke to shew; all I am to doe, is but to shew you what the controver-sie is, about which there is so much dispute.

And though I determine not the case either way, yet I shall leave two considerations to help you in your thoughts about it.

First, the extent of power of Jurisdiction must be by institution as well as the power it selfe; all juridical power whattsoever, either in State or Church receives limits or extent from the same authority it first had its rise, this is impossible to be denied: If a man by a Charter be made a Mayor of a Towne, he cannot therefore challenge the power of a Mayor wheresoeer he comes, except the authority that first gave him his pow-ver shall also extend it. Now the Charter by which any Church-Officer is invested with power, is the Word, therefore we cannot frighten or enlarge the power of a Minister otherwise then we find it in the Word; for Civill power it may be frightened or enlarged, as the Governours of State shall see cause, because their Charter is from man, it is ἀνθρωπινὴν κτίσιν.

Secondly, man naturally is of nothing more impatient then to have Jurisdiction challenged over him, except he sees the claime to be right; and in the point of spiritual jurisdiction, man is the most tender of all, because in that men come in the Name of Christ to him, challenging authority to exercise the power of Christ over him, not over the outward man so much as over his soule, to deliver it up to Satan. Surely there had need be shewne a cleare and full Charter, that any men have, that gives them such a power as this, that men in conscience shall shall be bound to submit to. Now then here lyeth the division, on sayes his Charter does extend so farre; the other sayes, hee does not finde it so in the reading of it.

There is yet a further consideration of the stretching either Civil or Ecclesiastical authority beyond their bounds, which hath been, and may be the cause of much division; that is, their challenging and excercising power in things indifferent, beyond what God hath given them; for the opening of which we must know:

First, no man either in State or Church, hath any authority given him by God, to command any thing mearely because hee will; especially, when the things concerneth the worship of God.
Our Brethren of Scotland in their dispute against English Popish Ceremonies, part 3. chap. 8. pag. 127. have this passage, Princes have enjoyned things pertaining to the worship of God, but those things were the very same which Gods Written Word had expressly commanded; when Princes went beyond these limits and bounds, they tooke upon them to judge and command more then God hath put within the compass of their power: And pag. 136.
of the same Booke they say, The Apostle, 1 Cor. 7. 23. forbid-deth us to be the servants of men, that is, to doe things for which wee have no other warrant besides the pleasure and will of men.
This was the Doctrine in Tertullians time, You exercise, sayes he, an unjust dominion over others, if you deny a thing may bee done, because you will, not because it ought not to bee done.

It is onely the Prerogative of God, of Jesus Christ, to command a thing because they will.

God hath appointed Civill Governours to be his Ministers for our good. Rom. 13. Those things onely which they can doe in Gods Name as his Ministers, and are for the good of a State, are the object about which their power is to be exercised; they are not to require a thing because there is nothing against it, but because this thing is for God: And Church-governours are to require onely such things as Christ requires, all the exercise of their power ought to be in the Name of Christ, hence not because they will, or because nothing can be said to the contrary.

In all they require of us, they must be able to say as Paul,
1 Cor.
1 Cor. 14. 38. giving rules about order and decencie, If any man thinks himselfe to be a Prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the Commandements of the Lord.

You will say, But are Governours always bound to shew a reason of their will, to those who are under them; or may not they obey except they know some good in the thing, besides their doing the will of those who doe command them?

Though no Governours may command but upon reason, yet the Governours of State need not always discover the reasons of their commands.

Wee may give up our Civill liberties so farre as to be bound to yeeld to our Governours commands, if wee see nothing against what they command, but have cause to suppose that they see some reason that we do not, which is not fit to make known to us. This is grounded upon this reason, that there are Arcana imperii, mysteries of State that are not fit for every man to know, the secrecie of them conduces most to the good of the State: But it is otherwise in the matters of the Church, which are spiritual, there are no such mysteries in the Church, wherein any members of it can be required to be active, but it concerns them to understand as well as to doe. All the actions of the Church as such must be done for spiritual edification; now a man cannot doe a thing for the edifying his soule, or the soule of another, but he must understand his action and the rule of it; he must see it required by the Word, or otherwise he cannot expect any spiritual efficacy in what he does; I may doe a thing for a civill good, wherein I may trust another mans reason, and this may be sufficient to attaine my end, the procuring of some good meerly civill, but this will never be able to reach to a spiritual good, I must see the reason, the ground, the rule of the action my selfe; I must judge by the Word, that this action at this time cloathed with all its circumstances is by Christ fitted for such a spiritual good that I aime at.

Besides, if things meerely indifferent be enjoyned, then is Christian liberty violated. No, say some, Christian liberty is in the conscience, so long as a man keepe his conscience free, the thing may be still indifferent to him in regard of his conscience, though his practice be determined, and so Christian liberty is preserved. This is the put off that the Prelaticall party made use of against our Brethren of Scotland many yeeres since, when they pleaded that by their usurpation Christian liberty was taken from them.

To that answer of the Prelates, they thus reply: When the authority of the Churches constitution is obtained to bind and restrain the practice of Christians in things indifferent, they are bereaved of their liberty, as well as if an opinion of necessity were borne in upon their consciences. They urge that place, Colos. 2. 21. where the Apostle gives instances, say they, of such humane ordinances as take away Christian liberty; he faith not, you must think that you may not touch, but touch not; you must not practise, not be subject to such Ordinances; telling us, That when the practice is restrained from touching, tasting, handling, by the ordinance of men, then is Christian liberty spoiled, though conscience be left free; if the outward man be brought in bondage, this makes up spiritual thraldome (say they) though there bee no more.

And further, the Apostle gives these two Arguments against these things:

First, sayes he, they perish in the use; that is, there is no good comes of them.

It may be you will say, What hurt is there in them? That is not enough, sayes the Apostle, to justify them, though there should be no hurt in them, yet seeing they perish in the use, seeing there comes no good by them, you must not doe them: But what if they shall be commanded by authority? may wee not doe them then? No, sayes the Apostle, that is another argument against them; they are after the commandements and doctrine of men; if it be a meere ordinance of man, and there be no other reason in the thing, but because man enjoyes it in the Church, you are not to doe it. Yea, in some respect we have not so much liberty in things indifferent, if they be enjoyed by men, as we had before. This is thought to be a very strange affirmation by some; but consider this one thing, and it will not appear so: Though I might doe such a thing before, yet if man shall take upon him this authority to command, meerly because of his will and pleasure, if I now obey I am in danger to edifi him, to strengthen him in his sinne; he challenges this authority, and I seeme to yeeld it to him, certainly he is strengthened in it by my subjection, except I doe this at least professe against any such authority of man granted by Jesus Christ.

But say some, If you take from Governours power to command things indifferent, you take away all their power; for things necessary are required without them, and things sinfull they may not command.

Surely this conceit comes rather from tradition then from due consideration; for it is not power enough to see to the keeping of the commands of God, that the Ordinances be kept pure, that there be justice between man and man, to reward those which doe well, and to punish the evil doers.

Yet thus farre must be granted to the Officers of the Church, they have authority from Christ to declare dogmatically, when a thing in it selfe indifferent, yet by reason of some circumstances, comes to be a duty, and this is to be regarded more then the declaration of any private brother or brethren, for they doe it by way of office in the name of Christ. This we finde Acts 15.
the Apostles and Elders sent their Decrees, ©γνατα κειμονα, their dogmaticall determinations about some things in themselves indifferent, but as cloathed with those circumstances they call them things necessary; they determine them to be done from the reason of the things, not from their authority; those things were duties before they decreed them, and had been, had they never decreed them. Even forbearing the eating of blood was a duty in case of offence, though their decree had never been,
and otherwise it was no duty, notwithstanding their Decree, for afterward Paul sayes, that whatsoever is sold in the shambles, they might eate of it, asking no question for conscience sake, and every creature of God is good, if it be received with thank-giving. Thus we have seen what the bounds are which God hath set to men in authority, or at least the controversie about them: Let them be carefull to keep within their bounds, as they are set to keep others within theirs: by this, Church and State, may enjoy much peace.
The 4. Dividing practice.

The fourth dividing prattise, Gathering of Churches disordered.

This is cryed out of as the greatest dividing practice of all: You may speak of this or that to be dividing amongst us, say some, but above all things, this Gathering of Churches is the great divider amongst us.

To this I shall speak in these six things.

First, it is not absolutely unlawfull for a Church to be gathered out of a Church. Voetius that learned Professor of Direccts, answering Jansenius, pleading against us for seperating from the Romish Church, which was the most ancient and famous Church: No, saies he, it is not absolutely evill to seperate from such a Church, for then the Christians gathering themselves out of the Jewish Church were Schismaticks, which is false.

Doctor Jackson, a Prelatiscall man, in the 14. Chapter of his Treatise of the Church, gives two reasones which he saies are just and necessary, for which men (whether few or many) may and ought to seperate themselves from any visible Church. First, because they are urged or constrained to professe or beleive, some points of doctrine, or to adventure upon some prattices which are contrary to the rule of Faith or love of God. Second, in case they are utterly deprived of freedome of Conscience in professing what they inwardly beleive, or bereft of some other means, either aliogether necessary, or most expedient to salvation. For which latter he quotes, 1 Cor.7.23. Ye are bought with a price, bee not ye servants of men. Although (saiies he) we were persuaded that we could communicate with such a Church, without evident danger of damnation, yet insomuch as we cannot communicate with it upon any beter termes, then legall servants or bondslaves doe with their Masters, we are bound in conscience and religious discretion, when lawfull occasions and opportunities are offered, to use our liberty, and so seek our freedome rather then to live in bondage.

This doctrine was allowed of in the Bishops times. Now suppose upon these two groundes there be a withdrawing from a Church, Christ does no where require his people to live without Ordi-
Ordinances all their daies,rather then they should joyne themselves together into another body.

Secondly, yet where these caufes are not, but men may communicate without finne, professing the truth, and enjoy all ordinances, as the freemen of Chrift. Men must not separate from a Church, though there be corruption in it, to gather into a new Church which may be more pure, and in some respects more comfortable. First, because we never finde the Saints in Scripture seperating or raising Churches in such a cafe: and secondly, there would be no continuance in Church fellowship, if this were admitted: for what Church is so pure, and hath all things so comfortable, but within a while another Church will be more pure, and some things will be more comfortable there? The generall peace of the Church should be more regarded by us, then some comfortable accommodations to our selves.

Thirdly, Although you cannot for the present communicate with the Church, in which you are, without sinne, or bondage, yet you are not presently to withdraw, to gather into another, or to joyne with another, you are bound to give so much respect to the Church, as to continue with much long-suffering, to seeke the good of that Church, to remove the sinne that is upon it, with all good meanes you can. You must beare much with a brother, much more with a Church.

Fourthly, If things were in that ordered and settled way, as they ought, there ought to be no gathering of any new Churches without consulting and advising with neighbour Churches, Christ would have all Churches unite themselves, and have conjunction one with another, being all of the same body of Christ: If then there be to be raised a new Sister Church, that expects and is to desire the benefit of Communion with the rest, there is all the reason in the world that the helpe, advice, and assistance of the other Churches should be made use of in the raising and ordering this Church that they are thus to owne in the way of communion with them to whom they are to give the right hand of fellowship.

Fifthly, All beleevers who live in a place together, ought so far as they can, joyne into one Church, though they be of different judgements and tempers, what ever things they differ in, yet if they may ftand with grace they can have no encouragement from the examples of any of the Churches, we read of in Scripture, for them to divide themselves into little pieces. The way of Christ all along in Scripture is, that all the Saints in such a place, who are not more then can joyne in one, should joyne together and make but one Church; certainly this is more for the honour of Christ's Body then the division of Saints in the same place into several little societies. Christ stands much upon the union of his Saints in one, in all ways, by all means that may be.

Sixthly, as things are yet with us, there is no such great reason of that outcry there is amongst us against gathering of Churches as so great a dividing practice as many seeme to make it.

How can this practice be so very offensive, when almost all of you thinke it lawfull for a man for any commodiousness to remove from that Church of which now he is, to joyne with another, so beit he will remove his dwelling?

But these do not set up new Churches.

If a company of men who have estates, should not be satisfied with that Ministry that belongs to that company that now they are joyned with, and should buy a piece of ground close to the place where they were, and build upon it, and have leave of the State to make a new Parish of those dwellings they build; who would blame them for gathering a Church thus? Hence it is apparent, that withdrawing from our Churches, and gathering others, is not according to the judgments of our Brethren against any Church Principle; the offence that is, is onely against some civil constitution.

Secondly, this thing in effect hath been ordinarily practiced heretofore without any offence to the godly; yea, and is still practiced without any complaint: Hath it not beene and is it not still ordinary for many not to communicate in the Parishes where they live? nor commonly to heare there, but from all parts of the City to come to some Parishes where they conceive the best Ministers to be, and there to heare and communicate, and this in a constant way, and that with allowance to the maintenance of such Ministers? yea, and thus the Husband goes one way, and the Wife another, and yet none offended; it may be the Gentleman can content himselfe with his Parish:
Parish-Church, but his wife or Lady is not satisfied, but must go elsewhere.

If it be said, But this was in a time when things were in great confusion, not so reformed as now they are, and we hope may further be.

Then it is not howsoever simply unlawful.

2. It continues so still in many places of this City.

3. When you have reformed further, it may be men's consciences will be further satisfied; you may reforme so farre as you may prevent much of what you now complain of much of.

But though they came for their present reliefe, yet they did not binde themselves one to another by Covenant, so as men now doe.

If those who came constantly to your Ministry and Sacraments had professed their willingnesse to joyne with you in all the Ordinances of Christ so farre as they knew, and to walke accordingly, you might the more comfortably have adminiftered ordinances to them, but offensive to you it could not have been.

But their Covenant bindes them so, that they cannot returne back againe, whatsoever reformation there be.

Doe you pray for and endeavour the putting on Reformation to the uttermost, and then see what they will doe; they have not yet declared themselves, that they hold themselves so joyned by any Covenant, that they may not joyne with you; that what reliefe they have had for the present time, or what agreement there hath been amongst themselves, should hinder them from falling into that way all along held forth in Scripture; namely, for all the Saints that live together, to joyne in one, so farre as possible they can.

But these who gather Churches thus, looke upon all others who are not in that way as Heathens; and what division must this needs make?

If this were so, it were a sad dividing practice indeed; wickeded men cannot endure to be thus judged of, to be cast out as unworthy of Church-fellowship, much lesse can the Saints bee able to bear it; it must needes go neerer to their hearts. Abar Ezra saies, the Ammonites and Moabites burnt the bookes of the Law, because of that place, Dent. 23. 3. An Ammonite or Moabite?
Moabites shall not enter into the Congregation of the Lord, even to their tenth Generation. If an Ammonite or Moabit cannot bear the being shut out of the Congregation of the Lord, how can the Saints bear it? But God knows, and our Brethren may know, I hope they shall know, that the thing is not so: O no, they looke upon you as the precious Saints of God, their deare Brethren in Jesus Christ, they bless God for the graces they see in you, and rejoice in the hope of living eternally in Heaven with you.

But why then will they not admit them to their communion?

Answ. In all worship that belongs to Saints, as Saints they joyfully joyne with them; but they thinke there is some that belongs to Saints as gathered in a Society under Officers, which cannot be performed orderly but in that way; and they think it unreasonable that any should have the benefit of the priviledges of the Church, and be under no power, no discipline of any Church; that they should pick and choose Ordinances, and yet live at liberty; so that if they walke disorderly, no Church hath any power to call them to an account. Suppose this to be a reason why they admit not of some, this is another thing then the judging of them to be Heathens.

Let me say further, I know none of these congregated Churches, either here or in other parts, that ever refused any who appeared to be godly, from communicating with them, if they did but acknowledge themselves to be members of any Church elsewhere, though that Church were in a differing way from it in respect of government.

You will say, What need that?

Answ. If it be to prevent looseness in men who will be under no government, if it be because they judge Sacramentall communication to be a Church-Ordinance; or if it should be through a mistake, yet howsoever this must not be judged to be the cause that they judge all, that doe not joyne with them to be as Heathens; this is the most uncharitable interpretation that can be.
The fifth dividing practice, The aspersing and seeking to blast the credits of those men whom the Lord uses to be instruments of good.

This may be done you know otherwise then by the tongue: This hath beene an old dividing way, if wee can blast the cheife of a party, we shall doe well enough with the rest, therefore let us make as ill interpretations of what they doe as possible we can; let us fasten as ill things upon them as we can have any colour or pretence for; let reports be raised, fomented and spread, whether they be true or no, it makes no matter, something will stick. Jer. 20. 10. Report, say they, and we will report it; doe but raise a report, let us be able to say wee heard it; or there was a Letter writ about such a thing, and wee will boldly assert it and divulge it; the very apprehension of it will prevail with many: howsoever, these men shall not have that esteeme in the hearts of men so generally as heretofore they have had, and if we once get downe their esteeme, we shall doe well enough with their cause; if we can meet with any bold spirit that will venture to encounter with them in this, that will dare to take upon him to gather up, or make, or aggravate, or wrest reports, or doe any thing that may render them otherwise in the thoughts and hearts of men then hitherto they have beene, we shall break them, it is but one or two venturing the hard thoughts of men to make an experiment, some may bee found fit for such a businesse, we will finde out ways to encourage them; if their hearts begin to faile, we will apply warme cloathes to them, we will one way or other support them; this must be done, or else whatsoever we doe will be to no purpose; something or other must be found to serve our ends in this. Doth Moses prevail too much in the hearts of the people? something must be found against him; if we can finde nothing against himselfe, yet we will finde something against his wife, shee is an Ethiopian woman, Nemb. 12. 1. and yet who was she but the daughter of Jethro, to whom he had been married many yeers before? for an Ethiopian and a Midianitish woman are all one;
one, but now we are resolved to pick out whatever we can get information of, though it be in things done many years since, when they were in the University, when they lived in such or such places in times of old, it will serve our turne, we may fasten it upon them, Prov. 16. 27. An ungodly man diggeth up evil, and in his lips there is a burning fire: If he hath nothing above ground, he will digge something up, though it be what both by God and man hath been buried long since.

David was a publike instrument of God for much good, yet Psalm. 31. 1. He was a reproach amongst his enemies, but especially amongst his neighbours. Nehemiah raised up by God for great service, what dirt was cast upon him? he was accused of sedition and Rebellion. Paul a pestilent fellow, hee and his company with him turned the world upside downe; what evil can be devis'd, but was fastened upon the Christians in the Primitive times? They charge them for being the cause of all their misery; if they have ill weather, if the Rivers overflow, if Nilus does not flow, if there be any earthquake, plague, famine, hale the Christians to the Lions: At their meetings they said they made Thyestes suppers, who invited his brother to a supper, and presented him a dish of his owne flesh, a limbe of his Sonne: Many such abominable things were fastened upon them as are not fit to be named. Tertul. tells the Christians, that they were Fam.ambulones, like men upon a rope, if they went one stept awry, they were in danger to be undone by it, so narrowly did their enemies watch them, and so maliciously did they aggravate all their miscarriages. Thus the most eminent after his time, as Athanasius, he was as miserably aspersed as ever poore man in this world, by the Arrian party, they rendred him most odious to his friends, and strangers.

In the beginning of Reformation, the Waldenses were so aspersed, that the story sayes of them, there was not one Arrow in the quiver of malice, but it was drawne forth and shot at them. Luther, Calvin, Beza, Oecolampadius, Bullinger, and the rest are by some in writing rendred the most black and vile pieces that the earth bore, both in their lives and deaths. I find it recorded of Zuinglius, that he was a man so eminent, as his friends made him almost a God; and so traduced by his enemies, that one would wonder the earth did not open and swallow up such a man. The like dealings did that worthy instrument of God Mr. Knox finde, who in Queene Mary's time fled with divers others to Frankford; when men of vile contentious spirits could not prevale against him any other way, they sought to asperse him, and that so maliciously, as his life was in danger, accusing him to the Governours of Frankford, for a Sermon preached in England; in which the Emperor was concerned. The words were these, O England, England, if thou wilt obstinately returne into Egypt, that is, if thou contarring marriage, confederacy or league with such Princes as doe maintaine and advance Idolatry, such as the Emperor who is no lesse enemy to Christ then Nero; if for the pleasure of such Princes, thou returne to thine old abominations, then assuredly, O England, thou shalt be plagued and be brought to desolation, by the means of those whose faavour thou seest.

The same meausure did those worthy men of God meete with, who fought after Reformation in Queene Elizabeth's dayes, they called Mr. Cartwright an Anabaptift, and whatsoever evill there was in any opinion in those times, they fastned it upon him. Mr. Udall was accused for his life, and condemned to be hanged for writing, That if the Parliament did not bring in the Government of Christ, Christ himselfe would bring it in by some means that would make their hearts to ake; or to that effect; meaning, as he expounded the words, Christ would in some way of judgement make way to set up his own government in the Land, but they wrested the words to a feditious sense, as if he had meant to conspire to raise a force, and by violence of Armes to make the Parliament to yeeld to that way of Government that he conceived to be Christ's, justly like those accusations that are amongst us at this day, that if such kindes of men cannot have the liberty of their way granted to them, seeing they have, or hope to have the Sword in their hand, they will take it to themselves, and defend themselves also in it.

Only in this they goe beyond the bitternesse of the Prelaticall party, they wrested what was said or written; these feigne what was never said or written; who are the fire-brands amongst us, if not such men as these? as fire-brands plucked out of the fire, and now they seeke to fire those who plucked them out; but if this be too hot, what will you call them? what will you say of them? O is this the fruit of all prayers for them, relief of them, respect to them!

Whosoever shall read that Booke of Bancroft, entituled, Dangerous Positions, published and practised by those who pretend Reformation for the Presbyteriall Government, shall find the whole subject of the booke to be the blasting the names of the most eminent godly Ministers that lived in those times, rendring them to the State, as men not fit to be suffered in any Christian Common-wealth. The State at that time being wholly for Prelacie, and discountenancing that way of government these men sought for, their adversaries thought they might be bold to take what liberty they pleased, to calumniate, traduce, and to render them as vile as possible they might, there was no such way to keepe them downe as this; in this, they being like those in the Primitive times, who put the Christians into Beares and Tygers skins, and then cast them to the Dogges to be devoured.

Let the servants of God but appeare as—they are, they will gaine reverential respect even from the multitude; but when these ugly things are put upon them, they are prepared to be the objects of their fury.

I have read in Suetonius of the cruelty of Tiberius, who because it was unlawfull that Virgins should not be put to death, caused the Hang-man to ravish them, and then to execute them. This is the cruelty of some amongst us, they can doe some men no hurt, but by offering violence first to their names, and if they be defiled, then they thinke they may doe any thing with them. Of such as these are who make divisions amongst us in so ungodly a way as this, all that I shall further say, is,

The Lord rebuke them.

As for the Servants of God they commit their names and wayes to God, knowing that the Lord takes care of their names as well as their soules. If dirt be cast upon a mud wall it sticks, but if upon Marble, it soon washes or moulders away. God will in time justifie his servants even in your consciences, by the constancie of their peaceable carriage towards men, and their their gracious holy walking with their God; onely take you heed that you involve not your selves in the guilt of that wrong that is done unto them by readinesse of your spirits to clofe with, and take content in what evill you heare of thofe whom God accounts faithfull.

CHAP. XXV.

The fixt Dividing Pratifice, the giving Characterizing names to men, names of Division.

This is an old continued practice of the Devill, he hath gained much by it, and therefore is loath to leave it: The Orthodox of old were called Cornelians, Cyrillians, by the followers of Novatus and Nestorius, in time of Reformation Lutherans, Zuinglians, Huftites, Calvinifts, Huganots. Tertullian fayes in his Apology for the Chriftians of his time, their crime that they are persecuted for, hath no name, that for which they are hated and persecuted is the crime of their name; fuch men are cryed out of under fuch a name, but when things come to be examined, their name is all their crime.

And among other that of Schismaticke is not onely a charaftifing, but a stigmatizing name, whereby of old and lately many have had a brand of reproach upon them, which upon examination will be found to be as it is applied by many, nothing but a fearing word, taken up by fuch who understand little what Schisme is; I fhall therefore endeavour to open this briefly. The word Schisme comes of the Greeke γένος, to rend, from thence γένος, Sciffura, a rent; It is amongst Divines a Tecno logical terme. Schisme in the Church, is much like to what Sedition is in the State: When the Church grew up to the state and outward glory of an earthly Kingdom, much use was made of this terme, as a brand upon thofe who would not subject to the yoakes of them who loved preheminence in the Church.

But the true nature of Schisme is this, An uncharitable, un-just, rash, violent breaking from union with the Church, or the Members of it.
The Church is that from which the rent is; Heresie divides from the head, Schism from the body, Apostacy from both. This rent is either from the whole Church, or some part, if from the whole, it is Donatisme: Donatus denied any to be of the body of Christ, to be believers, to be such as could be saved; except that company that joyned with him, and with those in his way. This is clear from the whole discourse of Augustine against him, in that Tract De unitate Ecclesia. Wherefore those who cenfure such as deny communion with some particular Congregations, as Donatists, discover either ignorance or malice, if not both. Yet Schism may be, though the rent be but from some part of the Church, but this must needs suppose union with that part: now there may be a twofold union with the several parts of the Church, either that which all who are to be accounted Christians have with them as they are of the same body Catholic; or that which is by agreement to grow up together into a speciall fellowship. The rending from any of these unions in such a way as before was mentioned, is Schisme. If we separate from, or refuse that communion with such as are to be accounted Christians, that is due to all Christians, this is the more grosse Schisme. Or if we thus breake off that communion which is by speciall agreement, which may be either when Christians joyne together in a private way for mutuall edification and comfort: or when they joyn together as to make up a distinct spirituall corporation, to set up the publick ordinances of Christ, which the Scripture calls a Church: Now though there may be Schisme in the breaking the former, yet the cenfure of Schisme is especially applyed to the undue breaking off communion in the latter.

Now this implies an union by a Church agreement; where there never was such an agreement, there cannot be the guilt of this Schisme. Although they who dwell within such a perambulation, such a compasse of ground, shou'd not joyn in some ordinances with some within that compasse, whatsoever offence there may be against some civill constitution, yet the guilt of Schisme they doe not contract upon themselves, for that union they never had cannot be broke.

But you will say, Yes, they are Schismaticks; though they were never so united, because they were bound to unite thus, and they have not.
It must be granted that Christ by what he ordered the Apostles to do, would have all Christians dwelling together, so far as they can, to unite into a body, but there is no such order of Christ, that all that dwell on the one side of the street should be of one body, and all on the other of another body: if they be more then can join into one spirituall corporation, they are bound to joyn into severall, so as they may best to their own and other Churches edification, and if they should fail in this, not joyning in the best way that possible might be, their sin is against that edification that Christ requires, but not therefore the sin of Schism. Who ever they were that bounded Parishes, surely they did not so bound them to the greatest edification of the Church that possible might be, and yet who will say they were therefore Schismaticks? But suppose you have joyned with any company of Saints in a spirituall corporation, if you now shall uncharitably, unjustly, rashly, and violently break from communion with them, then you contract the guilt of Schism upon you.

First, the separation must be from want of charity. By faith especially we are united to Christ our head, and by charity to one another. If a man appears departing from any fundamentall Article of our faith which joyned him to his Head, he is to be judged an Heretick. So by his appearing to depart from that love by which he was joyned in communion with the members, he is to be judged a Schismatic. If his departure proceeds from his love of God, his love to his Saints, and his owne soule, yea his love to that very Church from whence he departs, as sometimes it may, witnessing in a gratious way against evill in it, he is farre from the guilt of Schisme.

If you say, love is a secret thing, we cannot judge of what is in the heart.

We cannot judge of it while it is in the heart, but when it appears we may. You may know whether this or other principles act in men or no by their behaviour in their breaking off communion. Where this is not, bitterness, pride selfe-ends, will soone appear, and carry them beyond those principles themselves profess they goe upon.

Secondly, If the cause of leaving communion be just, then those who who give this cause are the Schismaticks, not those who withdraw upon it. Thus the Governours of the Church may be the Schismaticks, and a private member withdrawing may be free.

If Governours shall enjoyne any thing upon the Church, or any member, that is sinne; or if they shall mingle evill in the publique worship, so that there can be no joyning with their worship, but there must be likewise a joyning with sinne, in this case if any withdraw from them, they are the Schismaticks, not those who withdraw, they are fugati, not fugitivi. The blame of Schisme, sayes learned Voetius, must not be upon those who forsake such as have forsaken Christ and the ancient faith; but upon those who have thus forsaken Christ and his truth.

When the second Councell of Nice set up Image-worship, many thousands could not yeeld to it, but were forced to withdraw, who was the Schismaticall party there, but the Synod and those who joyned with it?

Yea further, if they impose that which is not necessary, (though in it selffe not sinfull) and will not beare with the weaknesses of such as thinke it to be evill; if upon that they be forced to withdraw; in this the Governours are the Schismaticks also; the cause of the rent is in them, they ought in such things to beare the weaknesses of their Brethren, and not imperiously to require of them those things that there is no necessitie of. If such things be sinne to their Brethrens consciences, if they will stand upon it to enjoue them, they lay a necessitie upon them to withdraw from them. God will not lay the Indictment of Schisme thus. Such a one departed from the communion of such a Church, because he would not doe what was lawfull to be done; but thus, You imposed that upon your Brother which there was no necessity of, and would not forbear him in what I would have you forbear him, but caused him by your imperiousness and stiffenesse, to depart from communion with you. It is true, sayes God, the thing might have been done, but it was not necessary, it was out of confence to me that they forbore, the weaknesse is theirs, but the Schisme is yours.

This hath beene generally received (though it be very false) that that if a man departs from a Church because he refuseth to joyn with it in that which is not in it selfe evill, that this mans departure is Schismaticall: Certainly no; Grant there is a weakness in his conscience, and so a sinne, he should informe his conscience better, but cannot; and this inability is not without sinne, yet this arises not to that height of sinne, as to make that (supposing him to be in this condition) is better for him to doe then not to doe) to become Schisme; especially if he be willing to hold communion with that Church still in all acts of worship, wherein he can joyn with sinning against his conscience, and continues brotherly love to them as Saints in all the expressions thereof, as he is able.

The first great Schisme in the Church, that was caused by the Governours of it, was that which Victor Bishop of Rome, and those who joyned with him caused, by that imperious way of enjoyning Easter to be kept at such a time which you have mentioned; pag. 15, 16, 17. The story of which you have in Eusebius, lib. 5. cap. 23. Those who denied not the lawfulnesse of keeping Easter, yet have generally accused Victor, and such who so violently urged this upon the Churches as the cause of the Schisme, not such who did not conforme to what was enjoyned them, because the thing was not necessary, and there should have beene a forbearance in it: No Governour ought to urge such unnecessary things which are but under suspition by tender consciences, if they do, the Schisme is justly charged upon them.

Thirdly, where a man cannot have his soule edified in some Ordinances and truths of great moment, which that Church whereof he now is shall deny, and is in great danger of being seduced to evill, he may depart from that Church to another, if he does it orderly, and not be guilty at all of Schisme, love to God and his owne soule is the cause of this, not want of love to his Brethren.

It is a good speech I finde Chillingworth hath, what the goodness of the man was I know not, but in that Treatise of his, The Religion of Protestants a safe way, Cap. 5. Part. 1. Sect. 61. answereth that plea of his adversary against Protestants, that communion with a Church not erring in fundamentals, upon pretence of erring in other matters, must not be forsaken, he hath this.
this excellent saying: If I did not finde in my selfe a love and defire of all profitable truth; if I did not put away idlenesse, and prejudice, and worldly affections, and so examine to the bottome all my opinions of divine matters, being prepared in minde to follow God, and God only which Way forever he shall lead me; if I did not hope that I either doe or endeavour to doe these things, certainly I should have little hope of obtaining salvation.

When I consider of these causes of departing from a particular Church, that speech of Tertullian concerning a Martyr comes into my minde, Non pena sed causa factit Martyrem. Not the punishment but the cause makes a Martyr. So, Non decessio sed causa facta Schismaticum, Not the departing, but the cause makes a Schismatick. Aquinas shewing that wherein the vitiousnesse of Schisme lyes, sayes, As in natural things that which is by accident does not constitute the species, so in morall, not that which is beside the intention for that is accidental: therefore, sayes he, the sin of Schisme is in that it intends to separate from that unity which charity makes, and therefore Schismaticks are properly those who of their own accord and intention doe separate themselves from the unity of the Church.

The next thing considerable in the description of Schisme; is the rashnesse of the separation: though the cause of separating be just, yet the manner of it may be schismaticall, if done rashly or violently. Those who are joyned in communion with others, when they differ from those with whom they have communion, they are bound to examine, try, to make use of all meanes they can to satisfie their consciences in things they scruple: and if they cannot, yet before they breake off communion they are bound to seek by all meanes they can for a redres of those things which after most serious examination appeare evil to them, they are bound to wait with much forbearance, and longsuffer-
ing. And at last if there be a necessity of departing, they must not rend away with violence, but shew themselves willing and ready in the spirit of love and meeknesse to open their cause, to shew their reasons to the Church why they cannot continue in that
that communion with them they formerly had, and desire that they may peaceably and lovingly depart, seeing they cannot with peace of their conscience and love to their soules continue with them, and that they may joyne with some other Church, where they may enjoy peace and further edification.

Surely here is no Schisme, this is no rending away, here is no violence used, here is onely a loving and peaceable secession; notwithstanding this, were it not the pride, envy and frowardnesse of mens spirits, much love and peace might continue amongst Christians and Churches: True indeed, if men can beare no contradiction, no kinde of blame of their wayes, there must needs be trouble; but then those who doe contradict or blame, though they be in the wrong, yet if it be through weakness, and carryed with meeknesse, they are not so much the cause of the trouble, as those who cannot beare this weakness of their Brethren without frowardnesse and contention.

There are other names of division; the name of Puritan, what a divider hath it been? but that seeing it self ready to dye, divided it self into two, Round head and Independent; these are now the opprobrious, discriminating, scornfull names of division amongst us: For the first, there is so much folly and absurdity in it, that surely it will soone vanish off it selfe if you contemne it; it is too low and contemptible for a Pulpit, or a Pen to meddle with. But the other carries in the face of it an open defiance to all kind of government, a monstrous kind of liberty for men to live as they list, and to be accountable to none, whatsoever they hold or doe: Certainly such kinde of people as these, are not to be suffered; shall I say in any Christian society? no not in any humane society; if there be any such people as these, they are one of the most monstrous kinde of people that ever lived upon the face of the earth: How many runne away with the word, and cry out of men and their wayes under this name which they know not? How farre those who are for the Congregationable way, are from such an uncontrouable liberty, hath been shewne, Chap. 7. Pag. 41. I shall adde this one thing, of all kinde of governments in the Church, that which hath this name fastened upon it is most oppositeto the name of any in that sense it is ordinarily taken, for there is no Church.
government that holds forth more means to reduce from error, or any miscarriage, then this doth; examine it with the Prelaticall or Presbyteriall Government, and you shall find it; for first, in the Prelaticall Government, if once the Prelates determine any case, you must there rest, there is no Church helpe for you, except you will say it is in a Convocation, where we know they ruled both in the choyce of members, and ordering all things as they list. In the Presbyteriall way, if so many associated Elders determine any case, it must in them receive the finall determination, you must rest in it, although the greater part of the Churches, and the greater number of Elders in a Kingdome should be of another minde; for if you rise to a Nationall Assembly, there are not the twentieth part of Elders of the Kingdome in it; But those who men call Independents say, that if any thing be done by them that is offensive, not only those associated Elders, but all or any Elders or Churches whatsoever may require account, may in the name of Christ doe all in effect, for the reducing of them, that those associated Elders can doe, still remembering that Church-power in one or the other, goes no further then mens consciences; if men wil not conscientiously regard what is done to reduce them from evil, there is no help within the Church, but to appeale to Christ, as for the externall helpe by the Magistrate, that concerns not the controversie about Church-government, and yet for subjection to that Ordinance of God, the principles and profession of those you call Independents leave as much to the Magistrate, as the principle or profession of those who are Presbyteriall doe, if not more. *Tolle jam nominis crimen & nihil res-*tat nisi criminis nomen*; Now take away the crime of the name, and there remains nothing but the name of a crime.
CHAP. XXVI.

The seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth dividing Practices.

The seventh, whatsoever personal evil there is in any one who is in a differing way from others, is cast upon all that are in that way.

This you know was the practice of former times, whatsoever evil any forward Professor was guilty of, that was cast upon all, they are all thus; Do you not see what Hypocrites they are? whatsoever their shewes be, yet if they have opportunity they will be as vile as any men; enough may be found against the best of them all, if they were narrowly watched; this is their way, they are a company of dissemblers: Such kinde of imputations are carryed upon the miscarriage of any one, upon all on purpose to enrage the people against them: We accounted this hard dealing heretofore, let us not now be guilty of such things ourselves.

Some such practice it is like, there was amongst the Corinthians, when that foule fact of the incestuous person brake forth, some of them were puffed up, so the Apostle chargeth them; it is a very strange charge that any should be puffed up upon such a thing as that; what was there in it to occasion puffing up? The Answer is this, It is cleare there were great divisions in Corinth, some sided one way, some another; now one of them who was of such a side, fell into this soule and scandalous sinne, upon that the other side thought they had an advantage against the whole party, and this puffed them up; nay do you not see what one of them hath done? you may by him see what kinde of men they are; this made the whole party low in their eyes; they cast the contempt of this one upon all that were associated with him in such a way differing from others: This could not but widen the divisions amongst them.

It is an evil advantage that men take, if they see some very erroneous many ways, and obnoxious in their lives, yet if these agree but in some one thing with those whom themselves differ from; all the odium of these errors and loose lives must be cast upon such as they thus agree with, in that one thing though their consciences cannot but tell them, that those Brethren who are in a differing way from them, doe abominate such errours and loosenesse of life as much as themselves.

After God used Luther to bring light into Germany, there arose many Sects; Papists say, there were grown in the Church after Luther's time, in one hundred yeeres, two hundred and seventy Sects, whereas from Christ's time to his, there cannot be reckoned above a hundred eighty one. Now this was the practice of the Papists, that they might cast an odium upon the Lutheran party, which they lookt upon as standing most in their light; whatsoever errours were held, or miscarriages of life appeared in any of these Sects, all was cast upon the Lutheran party, upon this ground, because the Lutherans and these sects agreed in this, that they were all against the Papacie.

There are many amongst us, who contend for severall wayes, Anabaptists, Antinomians, Socinians, Separatists, those that are for the Congregationall way, Seekers, with many others, they all agree in this, that they are against the Prelacie; Doe you now thinke it were a just thing for the Prelates to gather together all the errours, opinions, and miscarriages in life, in all these sorts of men, and cast the ignominy and odium of all upon our Brethren, who contend for the Presbytery? if they should say, Look what vile opinions are held by those who are against Episcopacie, how scandalously many of them live, but they all center in this, they would have the Prelacie downe, they are enemies to Bishops: You would prefently answer, What though they agree in this one thing? yet such as are for the Presbytery, they are as much against the errours and disorders of those who joine with them in this one thing, as your selves are.

We read Jer. 29.16. Shemajah sent Letters to Zephaniah against Jeremiah; marke the Argument he useth why Jeremiah should be dealt severely withall. The Lord, sayes he to Zephaniah, hath made thee Priest instead of Jehojadah. Why, what then? where lyes the force of his Argument, that Jeremiah must therefore be punished? It lay here, Jehojadah had punished one Matthan an Idolatrous Priest; therefore, sayes Shemajah, you must doe as Jehojadah did; as if he should say, they are both in one way, This Jeremiah was a Priest, and so was Matthan; such kinde of men must be looked to, they are all alike.
Matthan was odious to the people; they all said he was not to be suffered, and they being in some things alike, therefore all the evil which was found in Matthan, all the odium that was upon him, must be cast upon Jeremiah. Certainly this is a very sinfull, unjust, uncharitable practice of men, (especially such as profess godliness) against their brethren: it widens, heightens, and lengthens our divisions very much.

The eighth dividing practice is an inordinate cleaving to some, so as denying due respect to others.

This was the practice amongst the Corinthians, which caused great divisions amongst them; some were of Paul, some of Apollos, some of Cephas. No question a man may in his heart more reverence, and prize, and outwardly shew more respect to those whom God makes the greatest instruments of good (ceteris paribus) then to others. David shewed more respect to Nathan then to God; Nathan was by farre more intimate with him: The intimacy was such between them, that Nathan thought it a very strange thing that David should doe any thing about the disposing of his Crowne, and not make him acquainted with it. So Valeniamen the Emperour upon this ground honoured Ambrose above any of the Bishops in his time. Such men as God is not pleased to make so instrumentall for good as others, should not envy this; let them be willing that those should be honoured whom God honours: but yet people should take heed that they give not so much honour to one, that they deny due respect to others; and Ministers and others in publike place should not entertaine, much lesse seeke for, or rejoice in any honour or respect given to them, which they fee detraets from that esteeme and countenance that is due to others.

Peter Martyr upon that place, 1 Cor. 3. 4, 5. observes, that Heathen Philosophers were ambitious that their Disciples should receive denomination from them: hence some were called Platonici, others Pythagorici, others Epicurei, but this should be abominated amongst Christians. Laetusantius hath a notable speech against this, Those (fayes he) cease to be Christians, who take upon them the names of men, and are not called by the name of Christ.
Peter Martyr upon the forenamed place, layes of Socrates, that he was more modest then the rest, he refused to be accounted the author of that learning he taught others, but said of himselfe, that he was but a Midwife to be helpfull to the bringing forth of that, which was in the mindes of men before.

The weaknesse and folly of people in their inordinate giving or denying respects, is often caused, but more ordinarily fomented and encreased by the pride and vanity of teachers, in seeking for, or at least in a pleasing embracing such inordinate respects given to them, whereby others suffer much; siding of parties is made, and more hurt comes to the publike, then their honours are worth a thousand times over. This evill many times comes of it, that reason and truth from one man is little regarded; and error and weaknesse from another man is greedily embraced, and ritily maintained; whereas it should be with Reason and Truth, as it is with money, one mans money in a market is as good as another, so should one mans reason and truth spoken by him be as good as anothers.

_The Ninth dividing practice. Because men cannot joyne in all things with others, they will joyne in nothing._

Some men are of such dividing dispositions, that if they be offended with a man in any one thing, in hearing, or otherwise, they will goe away in a tetchy moode, resolving never to heare him more. You think you have liberty in any froward mood to cast off that means of good which God offers to you, to refuse to partake of such mens gifts and graces as you please; it may be your stomack is so high and great on a sudden, or your spirit is falne into such a fullens humour, as you will not so much as go or send to him, to see if upon a serious and quiet examination of things, you may not have satisfaction in what for the present offends you. No, mens spirits are carryed on with present rash heady resolutions. I believe there was never such a kinde of spirit prevailing amongst such as professe godliness, since Christian Religion was in the world; never did so many withdraw from hearing even those by whom they acknowledge God hath spoken spoken to their hearts and that before they have gone to them, to impart what it is that scruples them, to try whether they may not get some satisfaction. Certainly if you have no neede of the Word, the Word hath no neede of you. You may easily express your discontentes one to another; you may easily say you are resolved you will never heare such an one any more, but you cannot so easily answer this to Jesus Christ. When your weaknesses, the prevailing of your distempers shall grate upon your consciences, this will be a great aggravation of the evil of them. You neglected in a humorous way, and selfe-willed resolution, those means that might have done your soule good; even such as many hundred, if not thousands of soules blesse God for all the dayes of their lives, yea are now blessing God in heaven for. Heretofore you would have been glad of that, which now you slight and reject; this is not from more light or strength that you have now which you had not then, but from more vanity, pride, and wantonnesse.

Others deny hearing, not from such a distempered spirit, but out of tenderenesse, because they think the Minister is no true Minister of Christ, because he had no true call, because he was ordained by the Prelats, &c. I confesse though for mine own part I never yet doubted of the lawfulness of the call of many of the Ministers of the parishionall congregations in England, though they had something superadded which was sinfull, yet it did not nullifie what call they had by the Church, that communion of Saints, amongst whom they exercised their Ministry, yet I doe not thinke it the shortest way to convince those which refuse to heare, to stand to prove to them the lawfulness of the call of those Ministers whom they refuse to heare, but rather to make it out to them, that though their call be not right to the Ministry, yet they have not sufficient ground of withdrawing from hearing them. For they hold it is lawfull for a man to preach the Word as a gifted man, and that these men from whom they withdraw are gifted and faithfull, and preach excellent truths they deny not.

But they will say, If they did this as gifted men, it were another matter, but they preach by vertue of their call.

The answer to that is, if they be acted by that principle, and therein mistake, this is their personall sinne, not the sin of those who who joyne with them in a good thing, which they doe upon an ill ground. When I joyne with a man in an action, I am to look to the action, and to the principle that I goe upon, but let him with whom I joyne look to the principle that he goes upon.

Your hearing a man doth no way justifie his call to the office of the Ministry.

If a man doth a thing that he may doe by vertue of two relations or either of them, it may be he thinks he stands in one of those relations which indeed he doth not, yet he doth the action by vertue of it in his owne thoughts, in this he sinnes; but there is another relation wherein he stands, that is enough to warrant the action that he doth to be lawfull. Now though he doth not intend the acting by this relation, the action may be sinne to him, but not at all sinne to those who joyne with him in it. If he will goe upon a false ground, when he may goe upon a true, let him looke to it. I will joyne with him in that action as warranted for him to doe by vertue of his second relation, which it may be he will not owne himselfe.

Take an instance in some other thing, and the case perhaps will be more cleare.

Giving almes is a worke that a man may doe either by vertue of Church office, as a Deacon, or as a Christian whom God hath blessed in his estate, or betrufted with the distribution of what others betruft him with. Now suppose a man is in the place of a Deacon, he thinks himself to be in that office by a right call into it, and he gives out the almes of his Church by vertue of his call; but I am perswaded his call to that office is not right, he is not a true Deacon; yet if I be in want, I knowing that both he & those who have given him money to dispose, may and ought to distribute to thole that are in need, by vertue of another relation, as men, as Christians, enabled by God, surely then I may receive almes from him lawfully, though his principle by which he gives them me is sinne to him. I may communicate with him in this thing, though he acts by vertue of that office that he had no true call unto; why may I not as well communicate with a man in his gifts, though he acts thus sinfully himselfe?

This consideration will answer all those objections against hearing men, that they say are not baptized; grant they are not,
and so you think they cannot be Ministers; yet they are men gifted by God, and thereby enabled to dispence many truths of God to your soule.

The tenth dividing Practice, Fastning upon those who are in any errour, all those false things and dangerous consequences, that by strength of reason and subtility may be drawne from that errour.

This imbitters the spirits of men one against another; it is true, grant one false thing, and a thousand may follow, but I must not judge of a man that holds that one false opinion, as if he had the malignity of those thousand evil things in his spirit. I finde our Divines who have been of peaceable spirits, have condemned very much this fastening of dangerous consequences of mens opinions, upon those who hold the opinions, and yet whose hearts are as much against such consequences, as possibly may be deduced from them, as any: In their giving rules for peace, they advise to take heed of this, as a thing which makes Brethren, who are different in their opinions, unlikely ever to become one. Davenant sayes, It is abhorrent to charity to look what may follow from an opinion, but at what follows in the consciences of those who hold it.

miser eredis, explicite afferit, & hie opus est veritatem eundem vel sanguine suo obseruantur: verior & benignior est illa Magni & pacifici Theologi Buceri sententia, nostrum est non quid sequatur dignare sed quid in illorum sequatur conscientia pessare. Daven. Sententia de pace inter Evangelicos procuranda, pag 65.
Of dividing Practice, To commend and countenance what we care not for, in opposition to what we dislike.

When such as profess godliness shall make much of wicked men, shall commend them, joyne with them, embrace them; yea, be well pleased with the bitterness, boisterousness, boldness of their daring spirits, because there may be use made of them against those men and ways they differ from, this is an evil which brings guilt upon themselves, and makes the division between them and their Brethren very great: If your hearts be right, and your cause be good, you need not make use of any thing that is evil, to comfort your hearts, or to maintain your cause: The Lord will not be beholding to the evil, the bitterness of men's spirits, for the furtherance of his cause; and why should you? God will not take the wicked by the hand, neither shouldst thou: Are not your spirits strengthened against your adversaries, when you see them calling in Papists, and all manner of the refuse of men wicked and treacherous: Can you think that these are the most likely to maintain the Protestant Religion, and the liberty of the Subject? Why doe you seek to strengthen your selves by stirring up vile men to joyne with you, such as heretofore your hearts were opposite to? How comes it to passe, you can close so lovingly now? You can smile one upon another, and shake hands together: How comes it to passe, you doe rejoice the hearts of evil men; they encourage you, and you encourage them? Those unsavoury bitter expressions that come from them, you can smile at, and be well pleased with, because they are against such as differ from you; blow up that sparkle of ingenuity that heretofore hath been in you; lay your hands upon your hearts, bethinke your selves, is it the Spirit of Jesus Christ, that acts us in such a way wherein we are? Surely, this is not the way of peace, but of division and confusion.
The last dividing Practice, The Practice of Revenge.

When any provoke you, you say you will be even with him; there is a way whereby you may be, not even with him, but above him; that is, forgive him.

Practising revenge is the way to continue divisions to the end of the world; such offend me, therefore I will offend them; and therefore they offend me again, mee again, and I them, and so it may run in infinitum; they deny mee a kindnesse, therefore I will deny them, and therefore they will deny mee; so these unkindnesse run on endlessly; divisions will have a line of succession, where will it, where can it stop, if this be the way of men?

Paulus Fagius in his Notes upon Leviticus, cap. 19. v. x8. layes, If Reuben should say to Simeon, Lend me thy Axe, and he should answer, I will not; the next day Simeon hath need of an Axe, and he comes to Reuben, and sayes, I pray lend me your Axe, and Reuben answers, No, you would not lend me yours yesterday; the Jewes accounted this to be Revenge: There is much more malignity in our revengefull practices one upon an other then this.

En dicit, Da accommodatum securum tuam, & respondet Reuben, Nequaquam, siguidem tu mihi un accommodasti.

Basil inveighing against requiting evill for evill, in his tenth Sermon, speaks thus to a revengefull heart; Doe not make your Adversary your Master, doe not imitate him whom you hate; be not you his looking-glasse, to present his forme and fashion in your selfe.

Revenge God challengeth to himselfe as his; presume not to encroach upon Gods proprietie, to get up into Gods seate, and doe his worke, thou hast enough to doe of thine owne. And it is very observable, how God stands upon his challenge of revenge as his owne; as that which he by no meanes will suffer others to meddle with: in those Scriptures where this is mentioned, the challenge is doubled, yea, sometimes trebled, as Psal. xvi. 10. Basil. 94. I. O Lord God to whom vengeance belongeth, O God to whom. Hom. 10. vengeance belongeth: So Nahum. 1. 2. The Lord revengeth, Deira.
the Lord revengeth, the Lord will take vengeance on his Adversaries, Heb. 10.30. Vengeance belongeth to me, I will recompence faith the Lord; and againe, the Lord will judge his people: You must not think revenge to be so light a matter.

How unbeameing are revengeful practices to Christian profession! Many of the Heathens were above such things. Plutarch reports of Phocion, That when he had done notable service for the Athenians, yet was put to death by them; but being asked a little before his death whether he had any thing to say to his sonne; Yes, sayes he, that I have, I require of thee my sonne, that thou never wishest ill to the Athenians for this they doe to me.

How farre are most of us from this? we can hardly passe by an ill looke without revenge; but if we conceive our selves to be wronged in words or actions, then revenge riferes high, such things must not be born.

A Gentleman of very good credit, who lived at Court many yeeres, told me that himselfe once heard a great man in this Kingdome say, He never forgave man in his life: and I am moved the rather to beleive it to be so, because I have been told by some other Gentlemen, that the same man would when he was walking alone, speake to himselfe, and clap his hand, upon his breaste, and sweare by the Name of God, that he would be revenged, hee would be revenged; and that she who lay in his bosome, was wont to sit alone, and sing to her selfe, Revenge, Revenge, O how sweet is Revenge, ! If they get power into their owne hands, and are so xorous, as they must needs give way to have things managed according to the will of their revengefull wives: what peace, what security is there like to be? Sir Walter Ramleigh in his History of the World, tells of the sad case of the Lacedemonians, when Nabis having power in his hands, having a wife, Apega, a woman full of cruelty and revenge, her husband delighting in her, caused her Image to be made, lively representing her, and appareled with costly garments; but indeed, it was an Engin to torment men withall; he made use of it thus, when he could not have his will upon men by his owne persuasions, he tooke them by the hand, telling them, that perhapse his wife Apega, who sate by in a chaire could perswade more effectually, so he led them to the Image, that that rose up and opened the armes, as ift were for embracement, those armes were full of sharp iron nayles, the like whereof were also sticking in the brefts, though hidden with her clothes, and herewith the gripped these men to death: At which standing by, laughed to see the cruel death of these miserable men. The Lord deliver us from revengefull spirits.

The evill of Divisions, They hinder much good.

Eusebius reports of Constantine, That he was more troubled with the diffentions of the Church, then with all the warres in his dominions, that he took them to heart, that he could not sleep quietly for them; yea, although he had a spirit full of heroick valour, yet the diffentions of the Church were such e-Vils to him, as to cause him to cry and sob: Thus he writes in an Epistle to Alexander and Arius, Let me enjoy the days in peace, and the nights without molestation, that the pleasure which riseth out of the pure light of concord and quiet life, may henceforth inviolably be preserved; if it otherwise happen, it behoveth us to sob and sigh, and to shed many a salt teare.

What heart that hath any tenderneffe in it, bleeds not in the sence of those fore & dreadful heart-divisions there are amongst us! The evil there is in them, is beyond what tongue or pen can expresse: Take a view of it under these three Heads.

1. The good they hinder.
2. The sinne they cause.
3. The misery they bring.

First, the quiet, comfort, sweetneffe of our spirits is hindered by divisions: They put the spirit out of tune;
men who heretofore have had sweet spirits full of ingenuity, since they have interested themselves in these Divisions, have lost their sweetneffe, their ingenuity is gone. When the Bee flings, she leaves her sting behind her, and never gathers Honey more; men by stinging one another, doe not lose their stings, but they lose their honey, they are never like to have that sweetneffe in their hearts, that heretofore they had.

Shall
Shall I lose my sweetnesse, saith the Fig-tree, and goe to be promoted over the trees? Why doest thou not reaon thus with thy spirit? Shall I lose my sweetnesse in contending, to get my will to be above others? God forbid. There was a time that both my my felfe and others found much sweetnesse in the temper of spirit; there was nothing but peaceablenesse, quiet, calmnesse, contentednesse in it, and how comfortable was such a temper of spirit! me thought when my spirit was in that sweet frame, all things were sweet to me; but since I have been interested in quarrels and contentions, it hath beene farre otherwise with me. Prov. 15.4. Perversnesse in the tongue causes a breach in the spirit. Contentions cause much perversnesse in mens tongues, and this causes a breach in their spirits. Your contending costs you deare: though it were in nothing else, yet the losse of this sweetnesse of spirit makes it very costly to you. All the wrong that you should have put up if you had not contended, had not been so great an evil to you, as this one thing is. There is nothing more contrary to ingenuity then quarrelsonnesse. It is reported of Melanthon, that when he was to dye he had this speech, and Strigelius at his death had the same: I desire to depart this life for two causes: First, that I may enjoy the desired sight of the Sonne of God, and the Church in heaven. Secondly, that I may be delivered from the fierce and implacable hatred of Divines. There was much disputing, contending, quarrelling in those times, which was so tedious to the spirits of these good men, as it made them the willinger to dye, that they might be where their souls should be at rest. That Saint of God old M. Dod, never loved to meddle with controversie; he gave that reason, He found his heart the worse when he did. Men seldom come away from hot disputes, or any other contentions, but their spirits are altered for the worse. They finde it so, and others finde it in them. If a man has beene abroad, and met with company with whom he hath been contending, his wife, children, servants, finde that he comes not home with the same spirit that he went out with.

Secondly, they hinder the freedome of a mans spirit, which a wife man sets a high price upon: the strength of many mens spirits is spent in contentions; they have no command of them to any thing else. When a man is once engaged in a contest, he knows not how to get off; Contention is a great snare to a man, he he wishes he had never medled with it, he is weary of it, but knowes not how to come off fairely. I have read of Francis the first, King of France, consulting with his Captaines how to lead his Army over the Alpes, into Italy, whether this way or that way; Amarill his Foole sprung out of a corner where he fate unseene, and bad them rather take care which way they should bring their Army out of Italy back again. It is easie for one to interest himselfe in quarrels, but the difficulty is to be disengaged from them when you are in.

Thirdly, they hinder the good of the body; many men contending with their Brethren are so full of stomach, that they have no stomach, they hinder their sleep; men lye tofting up & downe a great part of the night, sometimes whole nights, mufing, plodding and contriving, how they may make their party good, what advantages they may get of those they contend with. Have the thoughts about the breach finde hath made between God and thy soule, broke thy sleep so much as the thoughts of breaches between thee and thy neighbours and brethren? We reade of Moses, Dent. 34.7. that he was an hundred and twenty yeeres old when he died, his eye was not dimme, nor his naturall force abated. Some give this to be one reason of such a wonderfull preservation of his health and strength, the meeknesse of his spirit: God witnesses of him, Numb. 12. 3. That he was the meekest man upon the face of the earth. That good old man Mr. Dod came very neere to Moses in the one and in the other.

Fourthly, they hinder mens judgements:if the water be muddie, we cannot see what lies at the bottome. These diffentions disturb the medium of our sight: you cannot weigh gold in the midst of blustering windes: you cannot consider and give a judgement upon truth, except the heart be calme. Gregory Nazianzen hath this similitude: As the earth, sayes he, is fixed to men whose braines and eyes are sound, but to those who have a vertigo in their heads it seems to turne round: so we are deceived in our apprehensions of things, we have not the same judgement of things when we love, and when we doe not love.

Fiftly, they hinder the sweetnesse of Christians converse and communion: you know your communion with the Saints was wont to be farre more sweet then now it is: ye were wont to have your hearts spring at the sight of one another: Ipsi aspectus boni.
boni viri deletat, says Seneca. The very sight of a good man delights, the sight of a godly man was wont to delight us otherwise then now it does: you look one upon another now sorrowly, with lowering countenance, and withdraw from one another: your comforts were wont to be double, treble, seven fold, an hundred fold, according to that society of Saints you conversed with all; one godly man accounted it the joy of his heart, that he had any thing that he could communicate to another godly man, and the other had the like joy that he had any thing to communicate to him; thus comforts were multiplyed; but now your comforts are single, Oh the sweetnesse, the satableneffe there was wont to be in the spirits of Christians! Shall I say satableneffe? it was a blessed onenesse of heart: they did as it were exchange soules one with another every day; their soules did close claspe one with, and cleave one to another. Oh how did they love to open their hearts one to another! what delight was there in pouring forth their spirits one into another! What cheerfulnesse was there wont to be in their meeting! they eate their bread together with singlenesse of heart and joy, praising the Lord. There were no such merry meetings in the world, as the meetings of the Saints were wont to be: They parted one from another with their soules bound up one in another; their hearts warmed, enlarged, resolved, strengthened in Gods waies. But now they cannot meet together but they fall a jarring, contending one with another, and part with spirits estranged from, sorrowed, and imbittered one against another: their hearts weakened, and more unsetled in the things of God then before. Herefore when they were absent one from another, yet the remembrance one of another was joyfull: but these dayes seeme to be gone. Where is there that opening of secrets one to another as formerly? every one is afraid of another. What sweet visits were there wont to be? what bearing one anothers burdens? what heart-encouraging Letters? It was with the Saints as in Tertullians time, Christians called Brethren, and were ready to dye for one another: but now they are burdens to one anothers spirits, they bring evils one upon another. Those who heretofore were forward Professors, whose society was onely amongst the Saints, now they can suit well enough with those who are carnal, they close with them, their converse is most amongst them. Oh
Oh Lord, what fire is it that is kindled amongst us! The nature of fire is, Congregare homogenea, & segregare heterogenea, to gather things of a like nature together, and separate things of a different: but our fire does quite contrary, it separates things that are Homogeneall, and joyns things Heterogeneall. Surely this is no other then the fire of hell.

Sixthly, they hinder our time. Abundance of time is spent about our divisions, which we are not able to give account to God for. When men are engaged in contentions, they will follow them night and day, whatsoever business be neglected, to be sure that must not: yea the choice of our time that was wont to be spent in meditation, reading, prayer, is now spent in contending and wrangling. Those retired times that we were wont to converse with God in, are now spent in the workings of our thoughts about our divisions; and when we come abroad then a great part of our time is taken up in going first to this body, and then to the other, to help forward and foment matter of division. Of all the time of a man's life, that time that is spent in lawing and quarrelling is the worst, and happy it were for many that it might not be reckoned amongst the days, weeks, or months of their lives.

Seventhly, they hinder our prayers. If two or three agree together touching any thing they shall ask, it shall be done for them by my Father, that ever liveth, Mat. 18. 18. I will that men pray, Eph. 2. 8. I will that men pray, lifting up their hands without wrath. When Daniel was in a strait, he goes to his companions, and desires them to lift up prayers to God for him, Dan. 2.17. There was a a sweet agreement between them. Hence their stock and trade in prayer went in common, but divisions do exceedingly hinder prayer, either one with another, or one for another. 1 Pet. 5.7: the Apostle giving rules for a peaceable loving life between man & wife, the woman must be meek, and the man live with his wife as a man of knowledge; and they must walk together as the heirs of life. Why lo? That your prayers may not be hindered. Private contentions in families are great hindrances of family-prayers. So our publick divisions and contentions are the great hindrances of the prayers of Christians in a more publick way. *How were they wont to pour forth their hearts in prayer together? then their hearts closed, but now it is otherwife. Men do not walk now together as the heirs of life, therefore their prayers are hindred. God accepts not of our gift, if we offer it when our hearts are at a distance from our brethren. When breaches continue, and we are not reconciled, you know Christ requires us to leave our gift at the Altar till reconciliation be made. It is the Spirit of God in the Saints that is the spirit of prayer: now God's Spirit is a Dove-like, meek, quiet, and peaceable spirit.

8. Eighthly, they hinder the use of our gifts: When Vessels are sowed with vinegar, they spoil liquor that is poured into them, they make it good for nothing: Many men have excellent gifts, but they are in such sower vinegar spirits, that they are of little or no use in Church and Common-wealth.

1. In these times of division, many men exercise their gifts and parts in little or nothing else but in matters of division; do you think that God hath given you such parts for no other end but this?

2. They have no hearts to impart to their Brethren their gifts in counselling, admonishing, strengthening, comforting: No, their hearts are estranged from them, they care not to have any thing to do with them: but do you think, that you are so far your own men, that you may keep in, or employ your talents as you please? Are you not the Stewards of Christ, are they not given to you for the edification of your Brethren, as well as for good to your selves? Can this satisfy your consciences? Such a one differs from you, he hath angered you, therefore though you have opportunity of being useful to him, yet you refuse it, as if it were at your liberty to lay out your abilities for good, or not. Certainly, this is not according to the mind of Christ. 1 Cor. 12.7. The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withall.

3. If you do make use of your gifts for the good of others, yet dissentions between you will hinder the profit of them, you are not like to do any good by them, except they be carried on by the oyl of love, they will not soak into mens hearts. When did you ever know a wrangling contentious Minister (though his gifts were never so excellent) do good amongst his people? And what comfort can a man have of his life, if he be laid aside by God as a useless man?

4. These
The Evill of our Times.

4. These divisions cause men to make the gifts of others useless to themselves, whereas God puts opportunity into mens hands, to get much good by those excellent gifts their Brethren have, yet if there be any difference between them, either they will not acknowledge the gifts of God in them, or otherwise they have no mind to receive from them that good they might have, because their hearts are not with them.

Ninthly, they hinder our graces; how little of God and Christ, little spiritualness appears in Professours of Religion since these rents and divisions have been amongst us, in comparison of what in former times hath appeared. As the members of the body (sages Augustine) are not quickned, except they be joyned, so even the members of Christ do not receive of the quickning vertue of Christ, except they be joyned: Here is the reason of the deadness, coldness, emptiness, barrenness, vanity of your spirits, you are not joyned: O where are the heavenly Christians that were wont to be, those humble, those holy gracious soules, who lived by faith, who were able to deny themselves, their whole lives were nothing else but a continual exercise of self-denyall, who were not onely patient, but joyfull under afflichions? Where are those watchfull Christians who walked close with God, who enjoyed such spiritual communion with him, as made their faces shine in their holy heavenly conversations? Where are those tender, broken-hearted Christians that were wont to be, who lived upon the Word, to whom the Word was more sweet then honey and the honey comb? Now there is another kind of face of Professours of Religion, as if there were godliness in these dayes, not of the same kind with that which was formerly. If our fore-fathers, who were the most holy and gracious, should rise againe, they would not own those for Professours of Religion who now make a great noyse, keep a great stirr about Religion, as if they had got up higher then their fore-fathers had, and yet are loose, vain, frothy, false in their way. Certainly, those holy, gracious Saints, whom these new Professours slight, were they alive, they would abominate them, as the great disgrace of, and dishonour to Jesus Christ and his Saints.

Take but away their disputes, and for any else, how empty and dry are they? If they ever had any grace, it is under a deal of rubbish, we cannot see it; and can these men be any other but an empty vine, seeing their hearts are so divided? The graces that they seemed to have had, are quite blasted; and if there were any in truth, they are exceedingly weakned; Vinegar will dissolve Pearls. Pliny tells of Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, that in her wanton bravery, at a Supper she made for Marcus Antonius, she dissolv’d a Pearl in Vinegar, and drank it off, and prepared another, both which were valued worth near five thousand pounds: Oh the many precious Pearls worth thousands of gold and silver, that are dissolv’d by the Vinegar sourness of men’s spirits in these sharp dissentions that are amongst us!

Our Divisions hinder the breaking forth of the lustre, the shine of Religion in the beauty and glory of it.

The fire of our contentions raises such a smoak, that it all besmothers us, it takes away our comeliness, it makes us look black, no amiableness appears in the ways of Religion to convince men of the excellency of them. Scratch’d faces, rent and torn garments we account a shame to us; distracted, divided spirits, rending and tearing one another, and from one another in our divided ways, O how uncomely doth it render us, and that profession of Religion that we take upon us! The Turks were wont to wonder much at our English men for pinning and cutting their clothes, counting them little better then mad men, for making holes in whole cloth, which time of it self would tear too soon: the cuts, rents, slashes that are in our spirit, in our divisions at this day, are much more uncomely, and may justly render us foolish and mad in the eyes of all that do behold us.

Our Divisions hinder our strength: If you untwist a Cable, how weak is it in the several parts of it? a threefold cord is not easily broken, but a single one is: Divide a strong current into several rivelets, and how shallow and weak will the course of the water be? That act that Plutarch reports to the King of Scythia, Scilurus, toward his Sons hath been very famous, to set out how divisions weaken where soever they are; he says he had eighty Sons, and when he was near death, he caus’d a bundle of Arrows to be brought and given them one by one, bid-bidding each of them to break it; they all answered, it was impossible for any man to do it; then he causes the Arrows to be taken out one by one, and bade one of his Sons break them, this any of them could easily do; upon this he speaks to his Sonnes thus, If ye agree together, ye shall abide strong and unconquerable; but if ye divide your selves, contending one with another, ye will be weak and easily overcome.

They hinder our doing good in publick; that which concerns many, must be done by many: But how can two, much less many, walk together, if they be not agreed? that which one does, the other seeks to undo: Now although God can turn whatsoever is contrary to his work, to the furtherance of it, yet man cannot do so. When God would hinder the work of building Babel, he comes down and confounds their tongues, so as they could not joyn together in it: Thus when the Devil would hinder the work of Jerusalem, he knows no way more likely then by dividing the hearts of those who are employed, if he can possibly, that thereby he might bring confusion.

They hinder our own ends; none are more cross'd in their ends and designs, then contentious people; we have not the mutuall benfits of one anothers Estates, Houses, the many ways of accommodation and help for one another, as heretofore we were wont to have; now every man shifts for himselfe; scarce any man who knew what the heartines of friendship meant, enjoys those outward accommodations as he was wont.

They hinder the blessing of God, Psalm. 133. The Psalmist commending the love of Brethren concludes, There the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for evermore. There! that is, where the love of Brethren is, there is a blessing, a blessing commanded by God; it comes with power, and this no less then life, and this life for evermore. God dwels in Salem, says Luther, not in Babylon; where there is peace, not where there is confusion.

Lastly, yea they hinder all good. They are like the Torrid Zone, nothing can prosper under it. When the Dog-star rises no plants thrive as at other times. When a fire is kindled in a town,
Heart-divisions

Town, the bells ring backward. When fires of contention are kindled in places, all things go awke. There is little joy in any thing.

Thus you see how great evill there is in our divisions in respect of what good we lose by them: now then consider whether it be possible that any gain we can get by them can recom pense this los; can anything got by them quit the cost? But if it could be supposed our los may be recom pensed, yet I am sure nothing can countervail the evill there is in them, in respect of the sinfulness of them. That is the next head.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The sinfulness of our Divisions.

Though there be sin in many things mentioned, yet we con sidered them in reference to our good that was hindred: but now let us consider what venome of sin there is in them.

The number 2. hath been accounted accursed, because it was the first that departed from unity. The departure from that unity God would have, is a very cursed thing, for it hath much sin in it. That which S. Aug. sayes of original sin, we may well apply to our divisions! They are sin, the punishment of sin, the cause of sin, nothing but a heap of sin.

First, they are against the solemn charge and command of God, and of Jesus Christ. 1 John 3. 23. This is his command ment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another as he gave us commandment. It is not an arbitrary thing that we should love one another, but it is the command of God, and a great command joyned to that of believing in his Son Jesus Christ. The one is as truly necessary to salvation as the other. Let men talk of faith, of believing on the Son of God, of trusting to free grace in Christ, yet if they have dividing, contending spirits, no love, no sweetness, no grace of union with the Saints, their faith is a dead faith. And because God stands much upon this to have his people live toget her in love, at the beginning of the verse he sayes, it is his commandment; at the end of the verse he sayes, he gave us command ent;
And it is also observable, that he fayes of the commandement of love, that he gave us that commandement. It is a gift, for it is a sweet commandement. We should not onely submit to it, as being bound by the authority of it: but we should open our hearts to it, and embrace it joyfully as a gift from God. The commandement of love God gives us as a gift from his love. The excellency of these commandements are further amplified, ver. 24. And he that keepeth his commandements dwelleth in him, and he in him. I do not thinke that you can finde in all the Scripture any command of God in one ver. and a piece of another so inculcated and commended. Again, chap. 4. 21. This commandement have we from him, that he who loveth God loves his brother also. If you thinke you have any command to love God, or to believe in Jefus Chrift, know the fame authority layes a command upon you, to love your brother also. Job. 15. 12. This is my commandement, that ye love one another as I have loved you. And ver. 17. These things I command you, that ye love one another. Chrift you fee likewise makes a great matter of the Saints loving one another. Surely the finne then must needs be great that breaks such a great commandement as this, upon which God the Father and Jefus Chrift his Son layes so much weight.

Secondly, these unkind and unloving divisions are against the prayer of Jefus Chrift, yea against that prayer he made for us a little before he died, Job. 17. 21. he prays to his Father, that all who did believe, and should after believe on him, might be one, as his Father is in him, and he is in his Father; and that they may be one in the Father and him: as if he should fay, Oh Father, I am now going out of the world, and I foresee, when I am gone, even thofe whom thou haft given me, who are one in me, and in thee, will meet with strong temptations to divide them one from another: but oh Father I befeech thee, let thy fatherly care be over them, to keep their hearts together, that they might be united in the strongest union that is possible for creatures to be united in. Oh Father, let them be one, as thou and I am one. Would we not be loath to lose the benefit of that heavenly prayer of Chrift for us in that 17. of job. read it over, see what soul-ravifhing excellency there is in it, seeing he hath expressly fayd he intended us who live now, in it, as well as thofe Disciples who then lived with him; Let us prize this.
Heart-divisions

this prayer, as being more to us then ten thousand worlds. Luther writes a chiding Letter to Melanthon; By those finfull distrustfull fears and carking thoughts of yours, sayes he, you do irritas facere praceus nostras, you make void our prayers. How great then is the evill of our divisions? by them we do what in us lies to make void as concerning us the prayer, that blessed prayer of Jesus Christ. Sathan, sayes Christ to Peter, hath desired to winnow you like Wheat, but I have prayed for you that your faith fail not. He shall not prevail, sayes Christ: Why? Because I have prayed for you. Oh blessed Saviour, is not thy prayer against our divisions, as strong? Canst not thou prevail with thy Father as well in this as in that? We know thy Father did and does ever hear thee: some way or other this prayer of Christ is, and shall be heard; yet our sin is not the lees, for it tends to the frustrating of Christ's prayer. Sathan desires to winnow us in our divisions, but he desires not to have the Chaffe divided from the Wheat, he rather would have the Chaffe mixed with the Wheat. The mixing the Chaffe with the Wheat makes a great stirre amongst us: But Christ's prayer which helped Peter in his winnowing, we hope will help us in ours: only let not us do any thing that makes against it.

3. Thirdly, our divisions are against our own prayers. How often have many who now are estrang'd from one another, heretofore so prayed together, as their hearts have seemed to melt one into another, so as one would think it impossible that ever in this world there should have been that distance between them that now there is. How often have we prayed, Oh that once we might be blessed with such a mercy, as to worship God according to his own mind! that we might be delivered from conscience oppression, from spirituall bondage! Oh that we might be delivered from the inventions of men in the service of God: that the Saints might joyn and serve the Lord with one shoulder. There were never such hopes that the Saints should enjoy their prayers so as of late there hath been, and yet never were they so divided as now they are: they now seek to bring one another in bondage. If five or six years since when many of us were praying together, making our moans to God for that oppression we were under, God should have then presented as in
in a Map, such times as these are to our view; could we have beened that it were possible that there should be such a distance in our spirits as now there is?

Fourthly, our Divisions are very dishonourable to Jesus Christ; were it, that they darkned our names onely, it were not so much; but that which darkens the glory of Jesus Christ, should goe very neere unto us. I have read of Alexander Severus, seeing two Christians contending one with another, commanded them that they should not presume to take the name of Christians upon themselves any longer; For (saiys he) you dishonour your Master Christ, whose Disciples you professe to be. It is dishonour to a General to have his Army routed, and run into confusion. The Devil seems to prevale against us in these our divisions, so as to rout us. John 17. 21. 23: is a notable Scripture, to shew the sinfulness of our divisions, in the dishonour they put upon Christ, and it may be as strong an argument against them as any I know in the Book of God; Christ praying to the Father for the union of his Saints, uses this argument, O Father let this be granted, that the world may beleev that thou hast sent me: And againe, ver. 23. Let them be perfect in one, that the world may know that thou hast sent me. If they be not united one to another in love and peace, but have a spirit of Division ruling amongst them, what will the world think? surely, that thou didst not send me; that I who am their head, their teacher and Lord, never came from thee, for thou art wisdom, holiness and love, & if I had come from thee, then those who own me to be theirs, and whom I own to be mine, would hold forth in their conversations something of that spirit of holiness, wisdom and love there is in thee; but when the world does not see this in them, but the clean contrary, they will never beleev, that I came from thee; those truths that I came into the world to make known as from thee, O Father will not be beleeved, but rather persecuted, if those who professe them by their divisions one from another, and oppositions one against another, shew forth a spirit of pride, folly, envy, frowardness; therefore, O Father, let them be one as thou and I am one; if this Petition be not granted, how shal I look the world in the face; I shall be contemned in the world: what am I come down from thee, for such glorious ends as indeed those were, for for which I came into the world, and when I should come to attain those ends, for which I came, shall there be such a carriage in those who doe profess my Name, that by it the world shall persuade themselves, that thou didst never send me? O what a sore evil would this be! surely any Christian heart must needs tremble at the least thought of having a hand in so great an evil as this is.

Fifthly, Divisions are sinfull because they grieve the holy Spirit of God, Ephes.4:30,31. Grieve not the holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed to the day of redemption. Surely, there is no godly heart, but will say, O God forbid that I should doe any thing to grieve the good Spirit of God, it is the Spirit that hath enlightened me, that hath revealed the great mysteries of God, of Christ, of eternall life unto me; it is that Spirit that hath drawn my Soul to Jesus Christ, that hath comforted it, with those consolations that are more to me then ten thousand worlds; the Spirit that hath strengthened me, that helps me against temptations, that carries me through difficulties, that enables me to rejoice in tribulations; the Spirit that is an earnest, to assure me of God's electing love; the Spirit that hath sealed me up to the day of Redemption; and now shall I be grily of so great a sinne as to grieve this blessed Spirit of the Lord? If I did but know wherein I have grieved it, it could not but make my soul to bleed within me, that I should have such a wretched heart, to grieve this holy Spirit, by whom my soule hath enjoyed so much good: I hope should for ever hereafter take heed of that thing, I would rather suffer any griefe in the world, to mine owne Spirit, then be any occasion of grief to that blessed Spirit of God. But would you know what it is that hath grieved it, and what it is that is like to grieve it further? mark what follows, ver.31. Let all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamour, and evill speaking be put away from you with all malice: And would you doe that which may rejoice it? Oh! God knowes it would be the greatest joy in the world for me to doe it, then ver.32. Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

Sixthly, these divisions doe grieve and offend our Brethren, this should not be a light matter to us, Christ accounts it a great evil.
evill to offend one of his little ones: We may thinke it a little matter to give offence to some of Gods people who are poore and meane in the world; so long as we have the bravery of it, and the countenance of great men, no matter for them. But (friend) whatsoever slight thoughts thou hast of it, Christ thinks it a great matter; you may look upon them as you under, the times favour you more then them; but if you shall give them cause to goe to God; to make their moanes to him, of any ill usage they have had from you; Lord thou knowest I was for peace to the uttermost that I could, so farre as I was able to see thy Word for my guide, but these who heretofore were as Brethren to me, now their spirits are estranged, their hearts are bittered, their words, their carriages are very grievous, and all because I cannot come up to what their opinions, their ways are; certainly this would prove very ill to you, regard it as lightly as you will; it may be when others carry themselves towards you otherwise then you expected, you vent your selves against them in quarrelling, in giving ill language, in vilifying and scorning, your strength runs out this way; but there are a generation of men, who being wronged, improve their strength in patient bearing, yet in making their moan to God in the exercise of faith, in committing their cause to him.

Mat. 18. from 24. to 31. you have the story of the servant who had ten thousand talents forgiven him, who yet took his fellow-servant by the throat who ought him a hundred pence, and put him into prison; the Text fayes, when his fellow-servants saw what was done, they were sorry, and came and told their Lord what was done. You do not hear them cry out of their fellow-servant; O what a vile base wretch was he who would deal thus with his fellow! No, but they went and told their Lord. It is not the way of Christians when they apprehend wrong done, to give ill language, to seek to right themselves or others by bitter provoking expressions; but their hearts being filled with griefe, if they must needs vent it, if quiet debates with their Brethren will not ease them, let them vent themselves in the powdering forth their complaints to the Lord.

Seventhly, there is much sinne in our divisions, for they stir up much corruption on all sides, both in our selves and others; As if you shake a glass of water that has dirt in the bottome, the dirt dirt spreads it self all over; so doth the dirty stuffe in our hearts, these divisions causing a commotion in them; that corruption is now discovered, that neither our selves nor others had thought had been in us: Do not you say in your hearts, and it may be one to another, Who would have thought it possible, that so much filthy stuffe should lie so long in such mens hearts undiscovered, which now appeares since these unhappy divisions have been amongst us? James 3.16. Where there is envying and strife, there is confusion and every evil working. When Snakes are cold, they lye still; but if the heat of fire come to them, then they hisse and put forth their fings: Thus mens corruptions heat by the fire of contention that is kindled amongst us, begin to stirre, to act, yea, to rise very high. The reason that some give of that prohibition of the Apostle, Ephes. 4. Let not the Sunne goe downe upon your wrath, which also I finde Chrysostome upon the place gives, is, because when mens wrath is stirred by contending, if it continues in the heat of it till night, as they lye upon their beds their corruptions will be boyling, they will lye musing and plotting against those that contend with them; their thoughts in the night season will worke up their corruptions to a great height; have you not found it so, when the Sunne was gone downe upon your wrath, you could hardly sleepe that night? William the Conquerour in his first yeer commanded, that every night at eight a clock a Bell should be rung, and that all people should then put out their fire, which was called the Curfew Bell: it were well that some were admonished every night, to cover the fire of their passions.

We stirre up likewise the corruptions of others, in these our divisions; doe you not see those disstempers formerly mentioned, working and breaking forth in your Brethren when you provoke them in your contending with them? O pitty, pitty thy Brother, if thou canst not pitty thy selfe; doe it not grieve thee, that thy Brother should bring sinne upon himself? Were it not better for thee to suffer, then for thy Brother to sinne? It is an evil thing to be an occasion of grieve to our Brethren, The Lord does not willingly grieve the children of men, but to be occasion of sinne to them is much worse: When did you ever meet with your Brethren, and had your spirits put into any heat, but after your parting when you began to be coole, you then saw cause.
cause to grieve for unsheathing words, carriages, breakings forth of passion, that there was either in you or them: Sometimes in a froward debate there is more sinne committed in one houre, then there is otherwise in a whole twelvemonth, between those who live lovingly and sweetly together: yea, sometimes such corruptions are stirred by differences and divisions, that one would think were not compatible to a Saint; namely, the rejoicing in the evil of other men, yea of godly men. David said, his zeal had even consumed him, because his enemies had forgotten God's word; but some men's zeal do even consume them, because their friends do remember God's Word; the more inoffensive they value, the more are they troubled; it were endless to mention the uncharitableness, wrong, malice, injustice, oppression, cruelty, with the abundance of other sins that are caused by our divisions.

Eighthly, Yet further, as they stirre up sinne, so they harden in sinne. Fire hardens the clay into a brick: Thus are men's hearts hardened in evil by our divisions, men who heretofore had tender spirits, their hearts were redy to relent upon any brotherly admonition, now they are stiffe, they stand out sturdily, yea behave themselves scornfully: O this fire of contention hath baked their lusts, hath hardened their hearts. Ezek: i. God promises to give his people one heart, and this heart should be a heart of flesh: While the hearts of the Saints are united, they are tender; but when they divide, they grow hard.

Hence is the reason why Brethren being false out, it is so hard to convince either of them of any ill carriage, they are angry, & they think they do well to be angry, and all because their hearts are hardened. Jonah was in a pettish mood, his heart was hardened with it, let God himself come now to convince him, he stands it out, he will by no means acknowledge himself faulty; no, what he does he will justify, he does well to be angry.

Ninthly, there is much sinne in them, for they are a means to keep off others from God's ways; if this be their religion for men to quarrel one with another, I will have none of it: Carnall hearted men use to charge Religion with all the miscarriages of the Professours of it. You know what Saint Paul says.
sayes, 1 Cor. 14. If men speak with strange tongues, and there comes in one unlearned, will they not be to him as Barbarians, will they not say they are mad? Thus when the men of the world looke upon those who professe Religion, and see their carriages, their ways strange, divided amongst themselves, will they not think them even mad people? I charge you, sayes the Church, Cant. 3. 5. by the Roes and by the Hindes, that you stir not up my Beloved till he please. This by some is interpreted thus, The Roes and Hindes are shy and fearfull creatures, by them are signified such as are observers of the ways of the Church, and ready to take offence at any thing they see amisse in them, therefore I charge you, say those who are faithfull, that you doe nothing that may make any disturbance in the Church, whereby such as are observers of your ways shall be offended: If they see miscarriages in you, they will fly off, and of all miscarriages there are none more offensive to the lookers on, then wranglings and contendings; when they see this, they will conclude, Surely this is not the way of Christ.

10. They are a very ill improvement of our zeal and courage; Zeal and courage have such an excellency in them, as its a thousand pitties they should have no other improvement then to raise and maintain quarels and divisions. The Lord hath use of every mans zeal and courage, reserve them for him, for some notable work that God hath to do for thee, and do not spend them about that from whence comes no good. If Soldiers lying neare their enemies, have no store of powder, should spend what they have in making squibs and fire-workes, would they not be condemned of folly, if not of treachery, by all? Those who have the most zeal and courage, have little enough to serve their turne, for the services that God requires of them, and must this be spent in unworthy brablings, wangling and quarrellings? That mans body is in an ill condition that hath a sore to which, the humors have recourse to feed it, leaving off the supplying to the parts of the body that are to be nourished and maintained by them; the sore is fed, but the other parts grow lank and feeble. Thus it is with many mens spirits, they are distempered, and then what abilities they have, are drawn forth to feed those distempers; what account can be given to God of such a use of them as this?
They make very much against the Cause of Christ now in hand, the great work of Reformation. Had we joyned hand in hand together, and set our selves to serve the Lord with one shoulder, what abundance of service might have been done? how might the honour of Christ have been advanced high amongst us before this day? But while one draws one way, another another, one seeks to set up, and another labours to pull down, how can the work go on?

You will say, That is true indeed, things would go on apace, if those who differ from others would give up their judgments and practices to them, to believe what they believe, and to doe what they doe. But how can this be? you would not have them give up their judgments or practices to them till they know they be right, and how can that be, till they by discoursing, praying, reading, meditating, finde that out? If some men had certainly found out the right, and other men knew certainly that they had done so, then the worke were at an end.

But when we complain of our divisions for making much against the Cause of Christ, or work of Reformation, we do not complain against men, because they cannot all understand things alike. But this we complain of,

1. That all men, who professe godlinesse, have not joyned in opposing that which they believe cannot stand with godlinesse, by all the wayes that God hath put into their hands.

2. That they have not joyned to promote those wayes of godlinesse, which they are convinced to be so.

3. That they have not joyned to study what wayes and means may be found out to ease the hearts and consciences one of another, to beare with one another, so far as Christ would have them be helpfull to, and beare with one another. It is this that hath made such a stop in the work of Reformation. A peaceable, humble, and quiet discoursing of things, furthers that Reformation that Christ would have. Doe you thinke that Christ would be pleased with such a Reformation wherein the lesser part should give up their consciences and practices to the Judgments of the greater? such a kind of flubbering over matters might soon be, but Christ must have all the matters of his worship worship and doctrine consented to, and practiced from a principle of faith. Let us joyn with all our might in all we know, and with peaceable, quiet, humble spirits seek to know more, and in the mean time carry our selves humbly and peaceably towards those we differ from, and Christ will not charge us at the Great Day for retarding his Cause, the great work of Reformation in hand.

12. These our dissentions are against a great part of the Covenant of Grace which God hath made with his people in Christ, and those many promises of so much peace that there is to be in the times of the Gospel. We by these do that which tends to make void the Covenant, we doe as it were say that Christ is not come in the flesh, 1 Joh. 4. 3. Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God, and this is that spirit of Antichrist. Many men talk much of Antichrist, but such as profess the Gospel, and yet are of unpeaceable, snarling, contending spirits, they have the spirit of Antichrist, and they doe not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. It is the Argument the Jews have against Christ, say they, If he were come, then that Prophesie Esay 11. 6. would be fulfilled, The wolf shall dwell with the lambe, and the leopard shall lye downe with the kid, and the cow and the beare shall feed together, &c. But this is not so, they bring many other places where Peace is prophesied of, as Esay 9. 7. Of the increase of his government and peace shall be no end. Those who seek for his Government, should seek for his Peace also.

Galatinus de Arcanis Catholice veritatis, spends divers Chapters in answering the Jews objections against Christ from these places with others, as Lib. 5. the 6, 7, 8. Chapters. A speciall part of the Covenant of Grace is in that promise, Ezek. 11. 19. I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within them, and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, ver. 20. And Jer. 32. 38, 39. They shall be my people, and I will be their God; and I will give them one heart and one way. Many men speak much of the Covenant of Grace, who manifest little of this part of it in them. If that which is against any command of God be sinfull, much more is that which is so directly against Gods Covenant with his people, that which tends to make even the Covenant of Grace to be of none effect; if it be of no effect effect in one part of it, it will be of none in the other.

13. By our divisions we cross that end God aimed at in the variety of his administrations in the gifts and graces of men; That this was not Christ's end in dispensing gifts and graces in a different way, that there might be fuel administr'd to contentions and quarrels, but rather to exercise love, we spake to before, now onely take notice of it as a consideration that set out the exceeding sinfulness of our divisions.

The Aggravations of the sinfulness of our Divisions.

First, That we that are Christians should be thus divided, it were not so much if we were Heathens; our divisions are against the very character of Christianity: *Hereby shall ye know that ye are my Disciples, if ye love one another,*sayes Christ. Love and Unity are Christ's badge, the Armes of a Christian, whereby he shewes of what House he is: But by these divisions of ours, what doe we but rend the very Armes that Christ hath honoured us with, and cast them under our feet?

Secondly, that we who were so lately in bondage, should upon the beginning of our deliverance thus fall out one amongst another, one from another, one upon another; for us who are newly come out of prison, who have upon us still the very smell of our prison garments, the sores of our necks by reason of those yokes that were lately upon them are not yet healed, and yet we thus presently fight one with another, this is uncomely and very sinful.

Thirdly, The union of our enemies is an aggravation of the sinfulness of our divisions; how great a shame is it that they should joyne better then we! have they stronger bonds of union then we? Psal. 83. 5. 6. we read of ten or eleven sorts of men who could all agree in that which was evil; the Text sayes,They consulted together with one consent, it is in the Hebrew, with one heart; there was Edom, the Ishmaelites, the Moabites, the Hagarens, Gebus, Ammon, Amaleck, the Phylistes, with the inhabitants of Tyre; Assy is joyned with the children of Lot: these were of several opinions and wayes in matters of Religion, and yet could joyne. I remember Gregory

Gregory Nazianzen in one of his Orations makes a bitter complaint of this, Who is there, fayes he, that is of a right mind, that doth not deplore the present state of things? Who can find out expressions to set out this calamity of ours, that thieves and robbers, tyrants and whoremasters should be at peace amongst themselves, yet we cannot be at peace? Revel. 17. 13. We read of ten Kings of the earth, that they are of one minde to give their power to the Beast, and to make war with the Lambe; shall not we be of one mind to fight against the Beast for the Lambe?

Fourthly, that such as God hath joyned in so many bands of union, should so divide as we do, as the bands of old acquaintance, of deare friendship in former times, that fellow-sufferers, that such as are related nearly, brethren, sisters, kinsmen, kinwomen, such as live in the same family, as are of the same society, the same calling, such as have received much good one from another, yet that now they should be thus divided, and by the occasions of so much evil one to another, this is a sore, and a grievous evil. Luther in an Epistle of his to his friend Spalatinus, tells him, that if he must perish, he would not that the Emperour Charles should have a hand in it, out of respect to him, but let me rather, fayes he, perish by those of Rome, for I know fayes he, what misery followed Sigismund the Emperour after the death of John Huss. Although we should desire that we might be no occasion of evil to any, yet if it must needs be, better a thousand times that the evil fall upon wicked men, and those who are at the greatest distance from us, then upon those who are godly, and so neare unto us.

Fiftly, that such as agree in so many things, yea in all things necessary for salvation, yea almost, if not in all the Doctrinall part of Religion, yet because of some few things of lesser moment, there should be such a fearfull breach as now there is, this makes the account we are able to give of our breach the worse, and our sin the more. And this is the evil spirit of some, they could with our divisions were in greater things, that they might justify their opposition so much the more.

Sixly, the finne is great, because it is Heart-division; if it were Head-division, difference of judgment, it were ill, but not so ill. Jer. 4. 18. Their wickednesse is bitter, for it reaches to the heart. This makes the wickednesse of our divisions bitter;
ter; the heart commands the head, but the head cannot command the heart.

7. They are the worse, because they break not so much as they do; wounds that take ayre, grow much worse then those who are kept closed; It is an ignorant, foolish speech that some pleafe themselves with, when they are provoked, & vent abundance of choler in bitter, wicked language: When I am angry, say they,
I must vent what I have within; it is better to let it out, then to keep it in. Indeed if the breaking of it out did make it to be lesse within then it was before, as the corruption of a fore is when it breaks out, then there were some reason in what you say; but it is otherwise. As the more you act grace, the more it increaseth, so the more you act finne, the more it increaseth.
And besides, Heart-corruptions when they break forth, they dishonour God in a publike way; whereas when they are kept in, the dishonour to God is but between God and your selves.

8. That our divisions are in the presence of wicked men, that we should discover our shame before them. Gen.13.7. the Text fayes, There was a strifes between the herdmen of Abraham and the herdmen of Lot, and the Canaanite and the Perizite dwelt in the land. Their strife was the more vile, because it was before them.
Let us remember when we are striving, that the Canaanite and Perizite dwell in the Land. It is not safe, fayes Nazianzen, to betrust him that hates a Christian, with the hearing any thing against a Christian.

9. Our divisions are long continued divisions, nothing can quiet us, as if they were irreconcileable. There is, fayes Nazianzen, a satiety in all things amongst men but in contentions;
in meat, in drinke, in singing, in all things otherwise most delight-full, but men have never adone in mischieving one another: We are like cocks, who are easilly set a fighting, and when they are in, they will never leave till they kill one another.

10. The late Covenant that should be a means to unite us, is made a meanes of widening our divisions, by making faltfe interpretations of it, by drawing the sense of it to what may serve mens turns, by charging men of perjury, because they come not up fully to what they would have them, by which abuse some seek to make it to be a very shame to their brethren.
II. We are then divided at such a time as this, the most unreasonable for divisions that ever was in the world: For,

I. First, it is a time of affliction. It was said with the Children of Israel when they were in the wilderness to meet with fiery Serpents to sting them; while we are in the wilderness in an afflicted condition, we are fiery serpents one to another. The Hebrew word that signifies afflicted, signifies meek, to note, that afflicted ones should be meek ones. When the storm is coming, the Bees flock together to the hive. Jer. 50.4. In those days, saith the Lord, the children of Israel shall come, and the children of Judah together, going and weeping they shall go and seek the Lord their God. Judah and Israel could not agree at other times, but when they are in a weeping condition, then they shall come together.

Secondly, it is a time of Fasting and Prayer; England never knew what such Fasting and Prayer meant, as it hath known of late: No nation in the world that we know of ever knew the like; and shall we in such times as these, when we are casting downe our selves before Almighty God, when we are judging our selves before him, in the pride and frowardness of our hearts contend against one another? Esa y 58.4. Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to fight with the fift of wickednesse. It is a fist of wickedness indeed, that fights in times of Fasts. Is it such a Fast that I have chosen? How doe we in the days of our Fasts, acknowledge our vileness, our unworthynesse of the least mercy, our pride, our self-love, our envy, our passions, all those distempers that are dividing distempers, yet still we continue in them, and they break forth into dividing practices? Surely our Fasts will rise up in judgement against us, to make the sin of our divisions out of measure sinfull.

Thirdly, It is a time also of great mercies; we are afflicted, but not forsaken; and mercies should sweeten our spirits. This Summer hath been a continued miracle of mercies; if our agreeing together, our love to one another were now beyond the expectation of all men, as Gods mercies to us have been beyond, and above all expectation, even such a fruit of mercies would be the greatest mercy of all. But if instead of being sweetened by mercies we are the more imbittered one against another, how great is this sinne? If we shall take occasion from our victories at Nazeby, Taunton, Bridgewater, Sherborne, Bristol, to seek to drive out of the Kingdom thousands of godly men whom God used as instruments of so great mercy to us; will not this be sin unto us? God brought us indeed into a wilderness, but he hath there spoke comfortably to us; our wilderness is our way to Canaan. It was the charge of Joseph to his brethren, Gen. 45. 24. when they were going from Egypt to Canaan, See that ye fall not out by the way: We hope God is leading us to Canaan, oh that we could see Christ looking upon us, and charging us, saying, See that you fall not out by the way, do not grudge one against another, let not one say, You are the cause of our trouble and another say, Nay, but you are the cause of our trouble; let every one charge his own heart, let every man fall out with his own sin as much as he will, but let not brethren fall out by the way.

Fourthly, it is a time of Service; God never put such opportunities of service into our hands, as now he hath. How many holy men who were furnished with large abilities and enlarged hearts to have done service for God and his people in former times, lived privately, only enjoyed sweet communion between God and their owne soules, but oh how did they prize opportunities of service! how did they thirst after, and greedily embrace advantages for publique work! they were willing to submit to any thing to the uttermost their consciences would suffer them, that they might be employed in work for God and his Saints; Though their encouragement from men was small, yet their work was wages to them; but in those times, almost all places of publique employment were in the hands or at the dispose of evill men; could they have foreseen that within a few yeers, there should be a doore open for all godly men, to full opportunities for the imployment of their gifts and graces to the uttermost. How would they have rejoiced and longed to have seen those times, and blessed those who should live in them! I am confident it cannot be shewn that ever there was a time since the world began, that so many godly people in a Kingdom have had such a large opportunity of publique service, as for these last five yeers hath been in England; and shall this opportunity be lost with our wranglings and contendings? Oh how unworthy are we to live in such times.
times as these are! When a Master sets his servants to work, and that in such a piece of work as is of great concernment, the opportunity of which if lost, will be a great losse to him: if these servants shall trifle away this opportunity with wrangling one with another about their work, one opposing another in it, will this be a good account to their Master? So much time was spent in work, but so much in quarelling, whereby there is little of the work done. We read of Nehemiah, cap. 6. 3. when Sanballat and Tobiah, those quarrelsome companions sent to him to meet them, intending to quarrel with him, he answered them, I am doing a worke, so that I cannot come, why should the worke ceaue?
If we see men set upon strife and contention, we should not meddle with them, to spend our time in answering what comes from them; our case were miserable, if we were at the mercy of every quarreller, bound to answer whatsoever he pleases to put forth. But let us tend our work; these opportunities of service that now we have are too pretious to give away to them, to be spent, to be loft upon them. How just were it with God to take these opportunities from us, to bring us againe into such a condition as we should be glad of a dayes employment in publick service, and then oh how would our consciences wring us, and grate upon us for such ill improvement of them, for such unworthy losse of them when we had them!

5. This time is the time of the tryall of our spirits. We never had such a time to try what spirit of love, what principles of union are in us, as now we have; and shall we now miscarry?
May it not be justly thought that all our seeming love one to, & cloasing one with another formerly, was only for our own ends?
Before we were all under oppression, or at least the fears of it, when we looked upon our selves as in the same condition, then the trial was not so much: but now there is some difference made in the condition of godly men. Some have the times smiling upon them more than others; now is the time of tryal. The time of the trial of the spirit of Pharaohs Butler towards Joseph, was when he was out of prison, injoying his preferment at the Court, & Joseph remained still in prison. Perhaps while they were fellow-prisoners he might tell Joseph that his heart did close much with him, and if he had any opportunity to be useful to him, oh what a happiness should he think it to himselfe! Surely it should be impro-
improved for the good of Joseph to the uttermost. But when he was preferred, when he had respect amongst great ones, and Joseph still was kept low, then he is not the same man that he was when he was Joseph's fellow-sufferer. Now he hath other things in his head: Joseph is forgotten by him. Where this evil is, be sure God will find it out: for it is an evil very grievous to his Spirit. Put these together, and it will appeare that it is no time now to contend, whatsoever we doe at other times. I remember I have read of Sir Francis Drake, having a dear friend of his slaine by a bullet as he sat with him at supper, Ah fayes he, I could grieve for thee, but now is no time for me to let down my spirits. So when any shal do such things as might cause contention, do you speak to your own heart, Ah I find my anger stirred; I could contend, but now is no time for me to let my spirits rise in a contending way; these times call for peace and union, not for strife and debate. This is the 11. aggravation we are divided in such a time as this.

The twelfth is, we are divided, notwithstanding we are all convinced of the evil of divisions. We cry out exceedingly against them: we tell one another that of all the tokens of God's displeasure amongst us these are the greatest. Yet scarce a man does any thing, or leaves any thing undone towards any help against divisions, or furtherance of our union. Every man cries out of the Theeze, but who stops him? We all say we would have peace, oh peace is an excellent thing! But where is the man who is willing to be at any cost for it, either in putting up any wrong which he conceives is done to himself; or bearing with his brother in any thing differing from himself? The Lord may justly judge us out of our own mouths.

13. We have complained of others who are in place of power, to be of harsh cruel dispositions. We have fayd if they had been of gentle, loving, peaceable dispositions, tendering the glory of God dearly, & the good of their brethren as their own, what abundance of good might they have done! We have thought in those times, Oh if such men were in place, who were then our dear brethren, whom we conceived to be of holy, humble, sweet, peaceable spirits, very tender-hearted towards any they saw godliness in; had they power in their hands, what safety, peace, rest, would the Saints have! How comfortably should they goe on on in their work! How would they be edified, praying the Lord! What a heaven upon earth should we have! And yet we finde it otherwise. We may say, we looked for light, and behold, (I will not say darknesse) but behold dimnesse even from them: for brightnesse, but behold obscurity. Oh how doe the carriages of these men in some degree justifie the harfthnesse, souverennesse, domineering and cruelty of some of the Prelates! We hope nothing shall ever befall us as to be such a temptation to us, as to justifie their places. But some of their persons are so farre justifie, as there is occasion given to think they were not such vile men as heretofore we thought they were. For now we see what a temptation there is in having the times shine upon men, in having power put into mens hands. We see now that men who have other manner of principles then ever they had, yet how sadly they miscarry when they come under the like temptations. How can we answer Christ Jesus for these things?

14. We are still divided, though we have seen the wofull evils that divisions have brought upon others, yet we cannot be warned by other mens harmes. Those who are acquainted with Ecclesiastical Histories, may furnish themselves with Volumes in this kind. Who can read that short but sowe History of the troubles at Frankford, but his heart must needs bleed within him? And of late what evils have almost all the Protestant party in Germany and through the Christian world suffered by divisions! And yet we engage our selves in them, and are every day engaging our selves more and more. How deep we shall sink the Lord knowes.

15. In our very labouring for union we are divided, in our endeavours for peace we are at variance. Nazianzen in his 12. Oration rebuking this strange miscarriage of men, hath this notable expression, while we would have charity, we study hatred, while we seek to sett up the corner stone which unites the sides together, we are loomed our selves, we are for peace, and yet we fight one with another. Our wayes of late have been little else but doing and undoing; yea, we crosse our selves in what we would do, by doing what we doe. We are all full of contradictions in our own spirits and actions, and we cry out of others, that they are not conformet to their own principles.

Lastly, the fin of our divisions is the greater, because we make Religion to patronize them. We divide from one another, and all under a pretence of Religion. Surely this Virgin is forced, for there is nothing more contrary to the name or nature of Religion, then to cause or further divisions. The name carries union, strong union with it: Religion à Religando, from binding us again to God, and to one another, after we were divided by our sin. To father our wicked divisions upon Religion, is no other then to bring down the Holy Ghost in the likeness of a Dove to be like a Vultur or a Raven. What spirit is it that we profess our selves to be acted by when we are working for Religion? is it not the Spirit of God? and is not that a Dove-like spirit? although we dishonour our selves by discovering the baseness of our own spirits by our divisions, yet let us not put dishonour upon the blessed Spirit of God; this makes the sin to be abominable. Nazianzen in his fore-named Oration, inveighs against this in those in his time, In our pleadings for the Seias almuth, we (layes he) belye one another; as if this were the way to maintain truth.

CHAP. XXIX.

The wofull miseries that our divisions bring upon us.

They are themselves fruits of the curse, therefore there can come no other but cursed fruits from them, except God, contrary to their nature, be pleased to over-rule them, which he only is able to do. It was the curse of God upon the ground, Briars and thorns shall it bring forth; It is no lesse curse of God upon mens hearts, that they bring forth such briars and thorns, by which they tear one another.

First, our divisions provoke the wrath of God against us; though the wrath of man accomplisbeth not the righteousness of God, yet it may accomplish the wrath of God. "Esiay 9. 21. Manasseh against Ephraim, and Ephraim against Manasseh; and they together against Judah; for all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still. When we are thus one against another, the anger of God is not turned away from us, we may feare his hand will yet be further stretched out against us; us; so long as our wrath one against another continue so hot, certainly God's wrath is not appeased.

We read of Abraham, when he was about sacrificing Isaac, he found a Ram entangled in the bryars, which God had prepared for him to be a sacrifice: We are this day entangled in the bryars, and we know not how to get out, it is a sign that we are prepared to be a sacrifice even to the wrath of God.

Secondly, by them we serve the designes of our enemies; what would they have given when they first divided from us, to have procured so great divisions amongst our selves, as have been, & yet are? If a Million would have purchased them, rather then they should not have been, they would (no question) have given it; I am sure they further their designes more then many Millions would have done:

Hoc Ithaecus velit, & magno mercenur Atrida.

We have often said that some who have kept at the Parliament have served the designes of the King and those about him better then they who were with him. Certainly those who foment divisions amongst us, do serve our enemies turne more then many that are with them. When in our contentions our spirits rise one against another, and we reproach one another, we do not consider, sayes Nazianzen, how unsafe it is to put weapons into our enemies hands. Yea he thought in his time, though neer thirteen hundred yeers since, the divisions of the Churches to be a great means to further and haften the comming of Antichrist: for so he sayes in the same Oration before quoted, I verily fear left Antichrist should come sodainly upon these our divisions, and left he should take the advantage of these our offences and distempers to raise his power over us. Let those therefore who cry down Antichrist so much, cry down divisions also, left they prove to serve the designes of Antichrist in a very great measure, though they think not so.

Thirdly, by these we make our selves a scorn to our enemies.

Hosea 17.11. The rage of their tongue shall be their division in the land of Egypt. When Malignants hear our rage one against another, we are a derision amongst them; these Egyptians jeere us, they conteem us, and all the power we can make against them. I find in one of Melanthon's Epistles, a story of one Bessarion, exhorting the Princes to concord, that they might joyne against the Turks he brings in this Apologue: There was a war between the wolves and the dogs; news came to the wolves that there was a hege army of dogs comming against them, intending to tear them in pieces; the wolves sent an old wolfe out to be a scout, he comes and tells them there were indeed a great company of dogs more then themselves were, but they need not fear, for he perceived they were of different colours: Upon this the wolves made nothing of them, accounting it an easie matter to deal with them who were so differing amongst themselves. In the same manner, sayes Melanthon, doe Staphilus, and Canisius, and others of the pough faction, triumph in respect of us; upon which he falls to prayer, That the Sonne of God, the Lord Jesus Christ, would governe them, and make all in our Churches to be one in gë majorum quam luporum, fed be & iberan-nem casum in canibus, hac voce confirmati lupi dissimilares facile pelli posse separabane. Melanthon, Epit. 108.

Fourthly, yea by these we are like to be made a prey to our enemies. Here many sad stories might be told you of the prevailings of enemies against divided people. The divisions of Israel at this time made them a prey to their adveraries, which you may see cleerly if you read 2 Kings 17. afterwards the divisions of the other tribes made them a prey to the Romans. When the Turks have prevailed over Christians, do not all stories tell us it hath been through the divisions of Christians? When Normans, Daës prevailed in England, it was by the advantage they had of our divisions; if we will still divide and contend, our condition may prove to be like two birds pecking at one another, in the mean time the Kite comes and catches them both away.

Fifthly, if God should free us from our enemies, yet we are like to devour one another, and this is a greater miferie then to be devoured by the common adverary. Gal. 5. 15. If ye bite and devour one another, take heed ye be not consumed one of another. What biting and devouring was this? It was not in an open hostile way, they did not take up Arms one against another, but by their different opinions and contentious carriages in matters of Religion. Their differences in the matters of Religion were very very great, Non de finibus, sed de hereditate, not about the bounds, but the inheritance it selfe; yet unpeaceablenesse and violence in their carriages one towards another, though the matter of their difference was so great, is condemned and threatened by the Apostle. Do not our Adversaries say, Let them alone and they will devour one another? God gives us good hope that he will deliver us from our enemies; but the hearts of many godly and wise men tremble within them, fearing lest that wolvish distemper of ours should feed upon our own flesh, when the matter that it had to feed upon from without is taken away.

Sixthly, if we should not devour one another, yet being thus divided, we are like to perish of our selves, as those Insectae, which after they are cut asunder, yet the severall parts live, they wriggle up and down a little while, but they cannot hold long. So it is like to be with us; except we joyn we cannot live.

Seventhly, these divisions are like to make many miserable indeed; for if God be not mercifull to them, and that soon, they are like to be such a rock of offence, as to split them, upon which they are running; they are in very great danger to make shipwreck of their consciences, yea I fear some have done it already; if it be not so, the Lord be mercifull to them, and prevent it. The spoiled houses, the torn estates, the maimed bodies of men caused by our divisions, are sad objects to look upon; but the broken, maimed, spoiled consciences that these have caused, and are like further to cause, were and yet are like to be objects before us to be lamented with tears of bloud. This shipwreck of conscience it may be is not felt now, but it will prove horror of conscience hereafter.

Eighthly, they are like to lay a foundation of much evill to posterity, this consideration is almost as sad as any. We think it a great evill that Kings children should be brought up in the sight of bloud, that they should be in danger to have principles of cruelty or tyranny infused into them in their tender age; we are afraid lest the muddy water they drink now should breed diseases in them that may break out afterward. Surely it is a great evill also for the children of the Church, to be brought up in the sight and exercise of divisions in matters of Religion; that that knowledge of Religion which they now take in, should be be as troubled waters full of soyle. In the beginning of this Parliament there was as hopeful a generation of young ones comming up as ever the Sun saw; but many of them have lost their lives in this publique Cause; God will certainly take a valuable consideration at the hands of the adversaries for their blood especially; we have cause to bless God for them: God made use of them to stop the rage, the overflowing of the proud adversaries upon us; they have served their generation, and have been more useful in it; then others who have lived 70. or 80. yeers formerly: but for those who are preferred, these divisions in the things of Religion have spoiled many of them, they are carryed away with such a strange kind of Spirit of error, of conceitednesse, folly, willfulnesse, bitternesse, licentiousnesse, and boldnesse, that their hopeful beginnings are lost, so that the next generation is like to reap very sour, bitter, and unwholsome fruits of these our quarrels and contentions. By what hath been said you may see why the Spirit of God, Prov. 6. 19, puts the flowers of discord amongst those whom God hates: What the harvest of such seed is like to be, we shall see in the next Head.

Aggravations of the misery that comes by our divisions.

First, our misery is the greater, because it is still increasing; Divisions make way for divisions; we beat our brethren till they cry, and then we beat them because they cry, is not this hard dealing? We read in our Chronicles that those who were born in England the yeare after the great mortality 1349. wanted some of their cheek teeth; if we should judge of mens teeth by their biting, one would think that now men had more teeth, or at least farre sharper then they were wont to have; there was never such biting as now there is. Yet thanks be to God this increase is not in all places, not in our Armies; time was when we were much afraid of divisions there, but now we hear they are comfortably united. Dividing terms are not heard amongst them as formerly; though there be differing judgements, their hearts and arms are open one to another, they love one another, they are willing to live and dye one with another.
The blessing of the Almighty be upon you; go on and prosper, the Lord is with you; he hath done great things by you, and delights to use you in great services, for the honour of his Name and good of his people. You have had and have the prayers of the Saints, they bless you, and bless God for you. Soldiers united in love, and hating that which is vile, are exceedingly strengthened in valour.

Plutarch reports of a Theban band that were but three hundred, yet were the most terrible to the enemies, of any, and did the greatest services: They were called the Holy Band, because they hated dishonest things, and were willing to venture their lives for honest causes, fearing dishonourable reproach more then honourable danger. But though this was one cause why it had that name, yet Plutarch thinks that the first cause why it was called the Holy Band, was from their intire love one to another. By the selfe same reason (saieth he) that Plato calleth a lover a divine friend by Gods appointment, These Thebans, together with other of their Countreymen, had a great power of the Lacedemonians to resift such a power as the Athenians, for feare of it, left off to protect them, renouncing that league that they had before with them. Every man, said the Thebans, were undone. But these despis'd Thebans meeting with the Lacedemonians about the City of Tegeyra, where according to the compute of some they were fixe to one, and a warlike valiant people, one came running to Pelopidas the Captain of the Thebans, saying, Sir, we are fallen into the hands of the Lacedemonians. Nay, are they not fallen into ours? saith Pelopidas. And so it fell out, for they utterly routed them. In all the wars that the Lacedemonians ever had, as well with the Grecians as with the barbarous people, no Chronicle ever mentioned, that they were overcome by any number equal in battell. Whereupon these Thebans grew so terrible to their enemies, that none durst for a long time encounter with them. After this battell Pelopidas would never separate them one from another, but keeping them together he would always begin with them, to give a charge in his most dangerous battells. Yet notwithstanding all this service they had ill requittall from the people, for when their Captain Pelopidas came home, they stirr'd up a party against him, that sought to break him, though they could not prevaile.
It is farther reported of this Band, that it was never broken nor overthrown till the battell of Chersona, where it seems they had some added to them. And see what love and valour will doe in an Army unto death. Philip taking a view of the slain bodies there, he saw four hundred dead on the ground, one hard by another, all of them thrust thorow with Pikes on their breasts, and being told that it was the Lovers Band, he fell a weeping for pitty, saying, woe be to them that thinke these men did or suffered any evill or dishonest thing.

Ever since our Armies have been united, God hath wonderfully blessed them. Shall men of warre be at peace? and is this comely? and shall men of peace be at warre? how uncomely will this be? Yet so it is, The seeds of dissentions never sprung up more against us then of late they have done. The spirits of men seeme to be heat and ready to boyle one against another in this City more then heretofore they have done. The Lord hath made London a blessing to the whole Kingdom, and the neighbour Kingdomes too. The children not yet born, will have cause to bless God for London, for their union, their faithfulness, their courage, their bounty: and shall now, when God is about bringing in rest to us from the rage of our enemies, a fire of dissention be kindled amongst us? Shall the comfort of all our former mercies and future hopes be lost, by raising up of new quarrels? and must this come from the City? The Lord forbid. The Lord make you like Jerusalem, a City Compact, at unity within it selfe. Your very name carries unity in the face of it. Cives a coemundo, says Cicer: quod vinculo quod comit societatis in unit coeunt quasi Cives. I remember I have read in Livy a notable speech of Scipio to the Citizens at Carthage: By what name, sayes he, shall I call you? I know not: Shall I call you Cives, qui patria vestra des-\textit{civistis}? Things are not come to this passe in this City. The Lord forbid that there should ever be that degenerating from that unity and love heretofore hath been, that there should be cause to say, Shall you still be called Cives, qui est patria unisate, a pristino amore mutuo descivistis, who have departed from your former unity and mutaul love. Oh no, Let brotherly love continue, Heb.13.1. Let none take your crowne, but abide glorious in the eyes of the whole Nation about you, and all strangers that come in to you. We pray for the peace of London, Let them prosper that that love it, Peace be within her walls, and prosperity within her Palaces. If any shall say, the City is not guilty herein, it is but some few private men: I gladly answer as Scipio in his forenamed speech did to the Carthaginians, making such an objection, Libenter credam negantibus, I am very willing to believe it. Only do you make it appear to be so, by knitting your selves so much the more strongly together, by how much any amongst you seeks to disunite you.

A second aggravation of the misery of our divisions, is, Surely none will pity us in all that evill that comes upon us by them. If God should have suffered our enemies to have prevailed against us, all the Protestant party in the world would have pitied us. If those who escaped had fled for their lives to them, they would have entertained them with much compassion. But if we mischief our selves by our divisions, we shall be looked upon as contemptible in the eyes of all. If we should flye to them, we may expect to be entertained with rebukes; You are an unworthy generation, God put a price into your hands, to have done your selves and all the Protestant party good; you might have freed your selves from thraldome, and many ways have been helpfull to us, but you had such proud, envious, quarrelsome spirits, that you brake asunder one from another, you mischiefed one another, and so have undone your selves and your posterity; yea are not worthy to live amongst men. Can we be able to bear such rebukes as these? Every man that is in misery desires to be pitied, but this misery is like to be such, as no pitty can be expected in it.

Thirdly, our consciences will fly in our faces, telling us that we may thank our selves for all this. It is a great part of the torment of the damned, that their consciences shall be always upbraiding them for bringing so much evill upon themselves. This shall be the gnawing of that worm of conscience for ever.

Fourthly, our misery is and will be aggravated by the executioners of it: our familiars, our brethren, those who not long since were dear to us, will be made use of to make us miserable. How great a misery will this be? When the men of Judah came up to Samson, to deliver him to the Philistines, Judg. 15. 11, 12. sayes Samson to them, But smear to me that ye will not fall upon me.
me your selves. He thought it a very grievous thing for the men of Judah to fall upon him. He did not so much regard what the Philistines could do against him. Certainly there is nothing in the world more sad then for one brother to make another miserable. The History of that Warre between Sylla and Marius tells of one having slaine a man not knowing him, but after he looked and found it was his brother, in the anguish of his heart, because he had slaine his brother, he took his sword and ran it into his own bowels. It is a great evill to be an instrument of evill to our brethren, and to suffer evill from our brethren.

This consideration might be enough to stop us in our divisions, and cause us to think of wayes of joyning. Plutarch in the forecited place, the life of Pelopidas, sayes, that the Poets write that the misfortune of Laias who was slaine by his brother Oedipus, was the first originall cause that the Thebans began to be in such love one with another, to joyn in that Holy Band before mentioned. If this were cause enough to take us off from our contentions, we have enough of this amongst us. The Lord be mercifull to us.

Fiftly, the misery of our contentions in the Civill State is such, as if we be overcome, we are undone, for our outward condition, we and our posterity are made slaves; if we do prevail, yet there is sadness in our conquest. That is a miserable war, which is thus. The Civill Wars of the Romans were such, Nullos habiture triumphos, there was no triumph, but sadness even in the victory.

Sixthly, what help can there be? for we wilfully make our selves miserable; if men will undoe themselves, who can help it? Except God comes in from heaven with a mighty hand to help, our wound is incurable.

Thus you have seen what evill and bitter things our divisions are; their root is evill and bitter, and they are the root of much evill and bitter fruit. We reade Gen. 38. 29. that Pharez was the son of Tamar; Pharez signifies division, fraction, from whence he had his name; Tamar signifies a Palm tree, Ab amaritudine, sayes Pagnine, according to some, from bitterness; Division comes from bitterness, and begets, like it selfe, nothing but bitterness.
Our Divisions are very evill, yet let us not make them worse then they are, and let us take heed that we be not made worse by them. Wherefore we shall

First, shew what are those ill uses which many make of them.

Secondly, that it is no such strange thing as some would make it, that there should be divisions in times of Reformation.

Thirdly, how it comes to passe that godly men are divided, who above all men, one would think, should agree.

Fourthly, why these differences are so strong, and sometimes so sharp amongst those men who seem to come very near together in the maine, the matter of whose difference lyes in smaller things.

Fiftly, how far God himselfe, and Christ, and the Gospel, may be said to have a hand in our Divisions.

Sixtly, What good uses we should make of our Divisions.

For the first. The ill uses that many make of our Divisions are,

First, Some upon the evils they see and feel in them, think it was better with us heretofore, and wish we had those times againe; Just like the murmuring Israelites, as soon as they were put to any straits, they wished they were in Egypt again; it was better with us then, say they. Yea Num. 16.13. out of discontent with their present condition, they commend the Land of Egypt, wherein they were Bond-slaves, to be a Land that flowed with milk and hony, murmuring at Moses that brought them out of such a Land. The Land of Canaan that God promised to carry them to, was a Land that flowed with milke and hony, but out of the perversnesse of their spirites they despised that Land, and Egypt now in this froward humour of theirs, must be the Land that flowed with milke and hony. Oh the perversnesse of mens hearts! if they be but a little crossed, how hard is it for God or man to please them! how unworthy are such froward spirites as these, to live in such a time as this, to see the great great work of God that he hath done for his people. It is true, heretofore men seemed to be more united then now, there appears more differences in mens opinions and ways than formerly; but whence was it that men formerly were not at such a distance? was it not because they were chained together? two prisoners chained to a block keep together all day long; men that are at liberty walk in the streets at a distance; if the prisoners should commend their life as more comfortable then yours, because they keep closer together all the day then you do, would you envy their happinesse? time hath been that a tyrannical chain hath been upon us, we dared not then discuss any matters of difference with freedom; if a Convocation determined it, there was a chain upon us to fasten us to it; now God hath given us more liberty to debate things freely, that we may finde out the truth more clearly; and though men while they are in their debates be at some distance one from another; do not say it was better with us heretofore then it is now, thou dost not speak wisely concerning this thing.

Surely these men who are so desirous of former times, are ad servitudinem nati, born to be slaves; it is pitty but they should have their eares bored for slaves.

Secondly, the ill use that others make of these divisions is to cry out of Religion & preaching; since there hath been so much profession and preaching, we never had good world, there was more love and unity before, all things were more quiet, neighbours were more at peace one with another: This is no other then if men when Christ lived amongst them, should have objected against him, Since this Christ hath come amongst us, we have had more trouble then we or our fore-fathers heretofore have known; we were not wont to heare of men poffeft with the Devill, so as now we do, now what a noyse is there in all the countrey of men poffefted with evil spirits? we do not read of such things before Christ's time; yet do you think this was a good argument why men should wish that Christ had never come? If the Devill be put into a rage now more then before, it is a signe he is more opposed then he was before; he poffefted all in quiet before, but now his Kingdome begins to shake.

Thirdly, because of these divisions, many resolve they will stand stand Neuters, they see it is doubtfull which way things may goe; seeing there are such differences, we will stand by and look on till we see how they will agree; by this means they do not only desir the publique Cause that is now on foot, but they are in danger to be for any thing at the last, or to turn Atheists.

Corysphome in his Sermons upon the Acts, Chap. 15. intimates that he would come to you, but we know not to whom we should come; one is of one mind, another is of another, we cannot tell what you hold; you are so different from yourselves. Corysphome answer is, This is but a cavill; for first, this hinders you not in other matters, where there is a difference amongst men, yet you will take pains and enquire which is the right; Ye Secondly, if you did know what you should hold, yet you would not embrace it, for you doe know what you should do, and yet you do not do it; do what you know, and then ask of God, and he will reveal more to you.

Fourthly, others cry out against these men that have been most active in this common Caufe, putting forth themselves, venturing their estates and lives, and putting on others; at the first these men were honoured, but men did not then see what would follow, they did not think that such troubles would have attended such undertakings as now they have found; upon this their hearts rise against those who were the most publique spirited; Had it not been, say they, for a few hot fiery spirited men who know not what they would have, things had never come to this passe, we might have been quiet; These men are by some, yea many, looked upon as no other then disturbers, men of turbulent unquiet spirits, and yet they have been the means of preserving you and your posterity from slavery, and of continuing the Gospel amongst you. This is an ill requital of all that willingness of theirs to hazard their estates and lives for your good; You have cause to bless God, seeing you were of such low, narrow, timorous spirits your selves, unfit for such a work as God had to do in the beginning of the change of these times, that he raised up others, and gave them enlarged, resolved spirits, fit for such a publique work, accompanied with so many difficulties as attended upon this, did they break the ice for you, and do you thus requite them? This is like a froward, perperversely patient, who flies in the face of his physician, because his physician makes him sick.

Fifthly, others seeing much evil come of the divisions among us, they think there is no way to help them but by violence, forcing men to yield to what they think is right. They think they do God good service in compelling men to the same judgement and way that themselves are of. This is a very ill use of them. It is a new and unheard-of way of preaching, fayes Gregory, to require men to believe by blows. To go from the Divine Word to an iron Sword, from the Pen to the Halbert, to perswade men to believe, is a way that Gerard confess. Cath.1.1.p.809. exclaims against.

Socrates in his Ecclesiasticall History, lib. 3. cap. 21. reports of the Macedonians petitioning Juovianus the Emperor for the banishing of those who were not of their judgement in matters of religion of great moment. The Emperor receiving their supplication gave them no other answer but this, I tell you truly, I cannot away with contention, but such as embrace unity and concord I do honour and reverence them. Tertullian in his book ad Scapulam, cap. 2. fayes, It is not the way of Religion to compel Religion, which ought to be taken up willingly, not by force. If you should compel us, fayes he, to sacrifice, what did you in this for your gods? none desire sacrifice from those who are unwilling, but such as are contentions: but God is not contentions. I finde in Thuanus his History, lib. 16. a notable passage in a writing that the Senat of Paris sent to their King in the yeare 1555. after he had sent forth an Edict requiring great severity against those who differed in matters of Religion: They professed to him they did not think his Edict equal, and that they could not subscribe to it: for, say they, we see that such severe punishments, for matters of Religion, render men detestable to the people, but their errors abide the same still, they are not at all altered in their opinions by severity: but for their parts they give their judgements, that it were better to go in the old way of the Church, which did not propagate detestable effect, quam errores ipsi corrigentur, aquam videri us potius victis Ecclesie veritatis infidiam, que non errore & saniem in religione constituienda ac propaganda, sed puriore doctrise & bonitate vitae anustum exemplis rem confecit, his vivant & sincerè Dei verbum docent, haec ratione pravarium de religione opinione luxuris correxit, haec remedia si spemantur, nullae leges, nullae edita buis male curando fatis cruentes. Thuanus hist.lib.16.
Religion by sword and fire, but by pure doctrine, and the good examples of the lives of their Bishops. Let them live piously, and teach the word of God sincerely, this is the way to root out errors that encrease so fast: but if this be not done, no Laws, no Edicts of men will doe any good. Sleidan in his Commentaries hath set down a Decree of the Emperour, King Ferdinando, and the rest of the Princes and States, that the controversy of Religion should be appeased by none other but by godly, friendly, and quiet meanes. But a few pages after he relates the effect of a Petition of those in Austria for their freedom in Religion, to King Ferdinando, with an answer of the King to them: In which there was this passage, That such as shall not like that Religion which the Prince hath chosen, may have free liberty to sell that they have, and go dwell in another place, without any blemish to their estimation. To which the Embassadors of Austria reply: What discommodities were herein, how heavy and sorrowfull newes this would be to the people, who feeth not? When they shall heare that they which have been ever most ready to spend their blood and life for the preservation and dignity of the House of Austria, must now forsake their most sweet native Countrey, so many yeers inhabited and enriched by their fore-fathers? Therefore we admit not that Answer in this behalfe: but as we have done heretofore, for the honour of God we beseech you, that you would suffer us to have no let in this matter, &c.

But you will say, What does all this tend to, but to plead for an absolute Toleration, which you seemed before to be against?

I answer, In quoting these Authors I own not such a judgment that possibly you may think to be in some of them for an absolute Toleration. How a Toleration should be limited and granted, I have spoke to before: but I produce the Authors to this end, that the rigoures of the judgments of some amongst us that think all differences in religion cannot be quelled by argument, must be quelled by violence, may be mollified. I am sure if any of these men go too far one way, those which I am now reproving goe as wide another. Fiercse violence in matters of Religion is dangerous; as the Chirurgeons rigorous handling his patients arm, breaks that bone quite, which before was but out of joynt.
6. Some take advantage by them to give themselves to loosenesses in their lives: it is a time of liberty, and they will take their time. If times were quiet and settled, they would be observed more narrowly, there would be means of restraint; but in these times every man takes his own way, and so will they. But know that God takes this very ill at thy hands. The more loose others are, the more conscienceable shouldest thou be: the worse the days are, the more circumspectly shouldest thou walk. Ezek. 44.10. The Levites that are gone from me, which went astray when Israel forsook me, they shall also bear their iniquity. The commonness of a sin is an aggravation of it.

7. Some make no other use of them, then to observe which way there may be advantage got by them: how they may fute themselves to this side or the other, for their gaine, or to drive on some private designe: so long as they can make use of the times that run such a way, they are for them: if the stream turn they can turn too: they, can tack about to every wind: their study is not to help to heale them, but to contrive ways how they may get by them. Hence they wrench and sprain their consciences with the quick turnings this way and that way: they will be on the funny side wherefoever it be. Cunning heads and corrupt hearts will serve their owne turns by all varieties of times. If they were in Diocleian's time, they could be Pagans; if in Constantines, Christians; if in Constantine, Arrians; if in Julians, Apostates; if in Tovians, Christians againe; and all this within lesse then the age of a man.

8. Some have their spirits in a base manner subjeguated by these divisions and troubles that come upon them: they care not what they do or submit to: so be it they may have peace, they will bow down their backs and consciences, they will put themselves and posterity under the yoke of perpetuall slavery: so be it they may be at quiet, and enjoy their estates for the present, no matter what becomes of the publick, no matter what becomes of the truth. They are content to let all go, to betray all, for their own private advantage. This is beneath the spirit of a man.

9. Others are discouraged, upon the sight of the great evils that daily flow from our divisions, and are like still to flow, their hearts sink in despair. They call into question whether it be the cause of God that we now undertake. When the Temple was building, there was no noise of hammer, axe, or any toole of iron heard in the house while it was in building. But oh Lord is our work Temple-work! We heare the noise not of hammer and axe, but of swords and spears, of drumms and cannons, of railings and revilings; these are dreadfull in our eares: but let us not be discouraged, for though there was no noise heard in the House, yet in preparation for the House there was. It may be all we are yet about is only preparatory work for the House of our God. If God will use us in this only, yet blessed be his name. Wherefore though our divisions be many and very evill, yet they are not so evill nor many, but that there may be hope in Israel concerning this thing. For consider,

It is no new thing for divisions to be in the Church.

The Apostle would not have us think it strange concerning the fiery triall, he means there of persequion. The fiery contentions amongst us, are another fiery triall. We should not think strange of this neither; as if such a thing had befallen us that never yet befell any. I think for all circumstances it is very hard to parallel, but the Church in all ages hath been sorely afficted with divisions. Acts 15. 39. Paul and Barnabas, two great Apostles, were so divided, that they could not keep company together, but went one from another in anger. The Text sayes, The contentions were so sharpe beetweene them, that they departed asunder one from another. The word signifies such a sharpeesse as there is in vineger. It is used by Physicians to signify the sharpeesse of the feverish humour when it is acting in a fit. Their disfention put them as it were into the fit of a Fever. You will say, Surely it was some very great matter that should cause such eminent and holy men to be in such a passion one against another, to be so hot as not to company together. Truly no: the matter was not great, it was whether Mark should go with them or no; the one would have him, the other would not have him, & about this the contention arose to this height. Reade the Epistle to the Romans, to the Corinthians, to the Galathians, you shall finde very great disfentions in these Churches:
ches: And in after-times especially, when God delivered them from those ten bloody Persecutions, the contentions of the Church were very great. When Constantine came to the Nicene Councell, divers of the Members of that Councell accused one another to the Emperour, and put up Libels one against another, which Libels Constantine caused to be burned. After all the debates of the Councell, with the presence of the Emperour, who laboured all he could for peace and union amongst them, making large speeches to that purpose, to them, yet there were five of them dissented from the rest in matters of greater consequence then any amongst us dissent from our Brethren, namely, in that point of Christ's being of the same substance with the Father. I finde in EUSEBIUS this grievous complaint: After our affaires, thorough too much liberty, ease and security, degenerated from the rule of piety, one pursued another with open contumely and hatred; we impugned ourselves by one another our selves with the armour of spite and sharpe speares, of opprobrious words, so that Bishops against Bishops, and people against people raised sedition; and they which seemed our Shephers, laying aside the rule of piety, practised contention and schisme among themselves; and whilst they aggravated contention, threatening, mutuall hatred, and enmity, and every one proceeded in ambition, much like tyranny it selfe, then the Lord according to the saying of Jeremey, made the daughter of Sion obscure, and overthrew from above the glory of Israel. The contentions of the Church caused by those four grand Heresies of Arius, Macedonius, Nestorius, Eutyches, one after another, exercised the Church a long time. There was much siding, some cleaving to one part, some to another in all these four. The first denied Christ's divinity, upon which the first Nicene Councell was called. The second, the personallity of the Spirit, upon which the second Generall Councell was called at Constantinople. The third, the distinction of persons in Christ, upon which the third Generall Councell was called at Ephesus. The fourth confounded Christ's natures, upon which the fourth was called at Chalcedon. About this time Pelagius and Donatus caused much disturbance in Europe and Africa. Epiphanius who lived in the third Century, reckons three score severall Heresies that had got head, many followers of them all, which caused great breaches in the Church Church from the time of the Apostles to the time wherein he lived. After the division of the Empire into the Eastern and Western parts, then arose mighty contention for the Premacy between the Bishops of Rome and Constantinople, that put the Church into wofull contentions for many yeares, one part excommunicating the other, writing and opposing one a-other to the uttermost. When this heat is at the hottest then on the one side, upon the Western parts God let out the Goths, Hunnes, Vandals, those barbarous people, and Mahomet upon the Eastern, so that all learning was almost extinct in the Christian world, and grosse darknesse came upon the face of all Churches. The Church having lost her lights, men of learning and worth, then the great contention about Images arose that εἰκονομαχία, the Eastern Churches demolishing Images in Temples, the Western maintaining them with extreme contention against the Eastern. There were not only excom-munications thundred one against another, but much bloud was shed in that quarrell. In this condition have the Churches been from time to time divided, yea fighting with one another about opinions. And for the divisions and contentions between particular men, and most eminent Lights in the Church, in those times, after they came to have rest from persecutions.
We finde most lamentable complaints in the writings of the Ancients, of the extreme offence these dissentions were to the Heathen. Nazianzen in his first Apologetical Oration: We are made a spectacle (sayes he) to Angels and Men, not as that valiant champion Paul, who fought against Principalities and ἄσελγεσίων Powers, but we are made a scorn to wicked men, in their Markets, their Feasts, their Playes, in all their meetings. The most vile

Chrysostome and Epiphanius fell out so bitterly, that the one wished the other might never dye a Bishop, and the other wishe.
that he might never goe home alive. And it fell out to either of them as each one had wished to the other, for Epiphanius came not to Cyprus, he dyed on the Seas by the way, neither did Chry-softome
sodome dye a Bishop, for he was deposed and banished the Church. The contentions between Jeromie and Ruffinus were bery bitter, who had been formerly great friends. Augustine in his 15. Epistle sayes, Their friendship had been famous in all the Churches. If such things may fall out between Jeromie and Ruffinus, (sayes he) who that is now a friend may not fear to be an enemy? Yet Ruffinus writes two Books against Jeromie, which are intituled Ruffini Investiva in Hieronymum. He begins his first invective, applying that of the Psalmist to Jeromie, Ps. 57.4. I lye among them that are set on fire, even the sons of men, whose teeth are speares, arrowes, and their tongue a sharp sword. In the beginning of his second, he accuses him of lying, and that he does himselfe what he reproves in others; with abundance of such kinde of bitter stuffe. And Jeromie pays him againe in the same kinde. In his 16. Epist. ad Principiam Virginem, he calls him a Scorpion, in regard of the poyson that came from him. And in his Apology against him, lib. 3. in the beginning of it he applies that Scripture to Ruffinus, Prov. 14.3. In the mouth of the foolish is a rod of pride. And that of Hay, Isa. 32.6. The vile person will speak villany, and his heart will worke iniquity, to utter error against the Lord. And I finde in an Epistle of Augustine to Jeromie, a great complaint he makes to him of those differences there were between Ruffinus and him: with very patheticall expression to move Jeromie to peace. When I read Cum legi sem your Epistles, I pined away with griefe, my heart was cold within me for feare. Oh miserable, oh lamentable condition that we are in! You who were wont to be most familiar, joined in the strongest bands; you who are wont to lick up the honey of the holy Scriptures, condicio, conjunctu- now there is bitterness amongst you. Woe is me that I cannot meet you together, that I might fall down at your feet, and weep my fill! that I might beg of you as strongly as I love you, sometime either of you for your own sake, sometime both of you for either's sake, and especially for the sake of those that are weake, for whom Christ died, who look upon you with a great deale of danger; that you would not in your writings spread such things one against another, which though you should agree you could not wipe off from one another; or such things as if ye were agreed ye would be afraid to reade.

Yea many times there was very hot contest between Jerome and Augustine himselfe. Sometimes I finde some of their writings one against another to be very sharpe.

If we can debate things without bitterness of discord, well and good; but if I cannot tell you what should be mended in your writings, and you tell me what should be mended in mine without suspicion of envie and breach of friendship, let us meddle no more, but discord a. Eiar. favour our healths and lives.

Si autem non posse ut inter nos discordias fine amaritudine fine, scribam nos dixerit inter nos dixerit nos sibi.

In after-times when God stirred up a spirit in Luther, and others, to set themselves against the tyranny of Antichrist, to throw off that heavy yoke of bondage, the dissentions between the chief publique instruments of God to the Church was very great, as Luther, and Zuinglius, and Oecolampadius, and Corolostadius.

Luther in one of his Epistles sayes, that there was no wickedness, no cruelty, that Zuinglius did not charge him with. And in another Epistle he complains that Corolostadius was more malitious against him then ever any of his enemies yet had been. And as for Oecolampadius, Luther was so provoked against him, as he called him the black Devill. We may see what strange corruptions are working sometimes in the hearts of godly men.

As for the many sects and rents in and presently after Luther's time, they would fill up a large volume to name them, with their severall opinions and wayes. There is one Schulselburgius a Protestant Divine, that hath gathered the chief of them together in twelve or thirteene severall Books that he wrote about them. There is not any one strague opinion amongst us now, but you shall finde it amongst them in terminis, and that so prevailing as to get a strong party to joyne with it. Only I remember not that one that hath taken some, who though they acknowledge the Scripture, yet think there is no visible Church upon the earth. In after-times who soever shall read Junius his Comment upon Psal. 122. will finde the state of the Church in his time miserably distracted and distrested with contentions.

Cannot
cannot (sayes he) but be exceedingly moved, when I think of these evills. What shall I doe? Shall I hold my peace when the Devill has stirred up so great a perturbation, has kindled so great a fire? Certainly there is such a fire kindled in the Christian world, that unless God looks from heaven upon us, it will consume all: the minde of men are as heareths for this fire, upon which sin burns; the tongues of men, some are the bellowes that blow this fire, others as fuelled by which this fire burns more and more. That the tongue cannot do to blow up and down this fire, that virulent papers do, dung carts of virulent papers, that is his expression. Yea a great part of the Christian world at this time, seems to be rather like the place of the burning of dead bodies, than the house of Christ's flock: are these Shepherds? are these the Sheep of Christ, whom I see to consume away in their miserable burning? Surely they are Shepherds, still, they are the Sheep of Christ, and anointed ones still: but many of them in this horrible and deadly burning, remember not that they are Sheep or Shepherds. And thus he proceeds further in pouring forth his soul in most grievous complaints.

This fiery trial of dissentions in the Church then is no new thing; we are to be sensible of it, to account it a great affliction, but not to look upon it as if some strange thing had befalne us, that never befell the Churches before.

But you will say, How can we do leffe but account it a very strange thing, that those who fear God should be thus divided? that dogs should snarl one at another, is no marvaile: but that sheep, that those who are godly should do thus, this we cannot but wonder at: for what reason can there be given for it, yea what shew of reason can there be imagined?

If we consider of things wisely, we have no such cause to wonder that godly men in this their estate of imperfection should differ so much one from another as they do; For

First, every godly man prizes and seeks after knowledge;

others mind little but their profit and pleasure; they trouble not themselves about the knowing the things of God, except ambition puts them upon it; they care not which way truths goe: But the Godly man prizes every truth at a high rate, worth the contending for, to the uttermost, rather then to deny it or lose it. In the dark, all colours be alike, but in the light they appear diverse. While the Egyptians were in the darke, they all sate still, but they moved with various motions when the light brake out upon them: when men discourse things, and desire to see farther into them, it is impossible, considering the weaknesses of the best, and the variety of mens apprehensions, but there must needs be much difference in mens judgements, & then considering that every thing they apprehend to be a truth, their consciences are engaged in it, at least thus farre, that they must not deny it for a world; this puts mens spirits at distance, although both be godly, both love the truth equally.

Secondly, Godly men are Free-men, Christ hath made them so, and requires them not to suffer themselves to be brought under bondage, they must not, cannot submit their consciences to the opinions, determinations, decrees of any men living; they cannot submit to any as Lords over their faith; this others can do: as for points of Religion, say some, let learned men judge of them, we will not be wiser then they, we will submit, and others must submit to what they shall determine: this makes quick work indeed of divisions, but this, those who feare God, cannot do; they must see every thing they own as truth, with their own light, yet received from Jesus Christ, though they reverence men of greater parts, deeper learning, yet they have the charge of Christ upon them, not to acknowledge it as truth, till they understand it to be so; this causes much contention amongst good men, through their weakness and corruption of their hearts.

The leffe distance men apprehend between themselves and others in regard of power, the more differences there are amongst them, as they say the greatest and forest stormes are about the Equinoctiall: Men are kept more at peace in the Commonwealth then in the Church, because there is a greater subjection of one to another there, then may be admitted in the Church.

Thirdly, godly men give up themselves to the strictest rules of holiness, they walk in the narrow way of Christ, it is broad enough enough to the spirituall part, but in regard of our corruptions, it is a narrow pent way; they dare not give way to themselves to decline a haires breth from the rule, to gratifie others; they dare not bend to them, that they might fute more with them, but must keep themselves to the straight rule; they must keep just in their path; they cannot go aside to give way to others; hence there is clashinge, every one not having the same thoughts of the rule and way that others have; those who walke by loose rules, in wayes that are broad, even to their fleath, they can fute themselves one to another easily, they can gratifie their friends, yea the corruptions of their friends more then others can do; godly men cannot yeeld for peace sake to such termes as other men can.

Fourthly, the things that the Saints are converfant about, are great things, things of a high nature, about their last end, their eternall estates; hence every one is very charie, and carefull, and strongly set to maintain what he apprehends; those who understand not the infinite consequence of those things, who have not had the feare of them fall upon their hearts, they wonder at the stiffnesse of mens spirits that they can be brought to yeeld no more in such things that they conceive they might yeeld in, and where there are different apprehensions of those things that concern mens eternall estates, even amongst godly men, they must needs stand out one against another, till God cauæs one of them to see things otherwise then now he doth.

Fiftly, the things of Religion are hidden mysteries, they are the secrets of God, they are hard to be understood, God reveals them in a differing way, they are not ordinarily so clearly revealed, but that the apprehensions of them are like to be different.

Sixtly, the Saints are bound to watch over one another, each is his brothers keeper, they ought to advise, admonish, reprove one another, not to suffer sinne to be upon their brethren; now this (through our corruption) is very displeasing, we doe not love to be medled with, to be crossed in what we have a mind to; but other men can better preserve their own quiet, by letting their brethren alone; I will not trouble them, lest I be troubled my selfe. Hence it is that they many times live more quietly one with another, then godly men do; yet this is a great evil, a shame to those who are godly, that it should be so upon any termes.

Seventhly, ungodly men are dead in sins, the Devil hath them sure enough, he doth not seek to stir their corruptions so much as he doth the corruptions of the godly; he shall not get so much advantage by the one as by the other; therefore he labours to keep the corruptions of the godly acting as much as he can, that he may disquiet their owne spirits, and the spirits of those with whom they converse.

Thus you see it is no such wonder why there are dissentions amongst men that truly feare God; Suppose they should live all together, yet so long as they live here in this muddy world, it cannot be but there will be sometimes foul weather amongst them; but if you look into the Church, and consider of the dis-seions there, there is a farther reason for them, for usually there are many hypocrites mingled with the godly there, they taking up a profession of religion and so creep into the Church, they finde spiritual things unsuitable to them, hence they fly off, their spirits not being brought under the yoke of Christ, they sling against those things that pinch them. We read Num. 11.

4. that the great trouble the Children of Israel had among them, after they were got out of Egypt, was from the mixt multitude that was among them; these are as ill humours in the body, that do much disturb the quiet of it. None have more turbulent, cruell, impatient spirits, then hypocrites; none are so desirous of revenge as they, says Luther.

Yer further, the fourth thing propounded, is to shew, that those that come nearest together, yet differing in some things, are many times at greater variance one with another, then those who differ in more things from them. The Jews and Samaritans were at greater variance then Jews and Heathens.

Epiphanius tells of a sect of the Jews, the Nazarites, who continued the Customes and Ceremonies of the Jewes, but acknowledged Christ also; and the Jews in hatred to them cursed them solemnly three times a day, morning, noon, and evening, when they went into their Synagogue to pray.

The Turks have a honourable esteeme of Christ, which the Tartars have not; yet they say, that the Tartars turn Christians sooner then the Turks: The Turks and Persians are both Mahometans
metans, they are both circumcised; but the Turks follow the way of Ebubezer, and the Persians are of the Schohle of Haly; they detest one another more than they do the Christians; they will both tolerate Christians to live amongst them, but they will not tolerate Mahometans, who are in a different order from themselves.

Luther complains much of those who acknowledged the same doctrine, professd the same faith with himself, came to the same Sacraments, yet were worse enemies than the Papists, so that the Papists laughed at them, and said, They bite one another, and are consumed one of another.

I have read of a prophane speech of one Cosmus Duke of Florence, against some peridious friends. You shall read (fayes he) that we are commanded to forgive our enemies, but you never read that we are commanded to forgive our friends. Breaches of friends of such as are otherwise nearest are the greatest. Prov. 18. 19. A brother offended is harder to be won then a City, and their contentions are like the bars of a Castle.

1. We see it in nature, the nearer the union is, the more grievous is the usurpation; tis not so great an evil to a man for his armes to be seperated from his body, as his soule; for the union of the one is integrall, of the other it is essential. The bone is more firmly united in all the parts of it then the flesh, and the least breach in that is farre more hurtfull then a greater in the flesh.

2. Those who agree in many things have hope it may be to get one another to them; upon this they struggle with one another the more: as for those who are at a great distance, they have no hope to prevaile with them, therefore they make no onset, but seeing themselves frustrated of their hopes, there this troubles them, yea it oft stirs up a spirit of anger against them whom they cannot get up to themselves.

3. Those who agree in many and great things, and yet stand out in few and of lesser consequence, are thought to be the more unreasonable; if you yeeld thus far, why not a little farther? the one thinks so of the other, and the other thinks so of him, and hence their spirits are sturred one against another.

4. Those who come up near to others, and yet dissent, seeme to stand more in the light of those they come up so neare unto,

I i
then those do who are at a greater distance: it makes men think such a one is not in the right, if he were, those who come so near to him would see it; they who think themselves got beyond others, cannot enjoy that comfort and content in what they are beyond others in, as otherwise they might, because such as are so near them are against it, if they did not agree in most things, and those of greatest moment, their opposition would not be much regarded: but because they are such men who for their judgements and lives are so unblameable, their differing in such a thing is more then if a hundred times as many, who were at a greater distance in their principles and lives, should differ from us.

5. They who are so near one to another, have occasion to converse more together then others have, and to argue things oftner one with another, then with such as they differ more from. Now it is seldome that men of differing judgements and wayes meet and argue, but there is some heat between them before they have done: and so their spirits grow more estranged one from another then before. And if your spirits be estranged, then those that you have reference to, and such as are in your way, will have their spirits estranged too, your relation of things to them according to what apprehensions you have of them, will be enough to estrange their hearts, and so by degrees a bitterness grows up between you.

5. The fifth thing, That God hath a hand in our divisions, and how farre.}

God had a great stroak in the division of these ten Tribes from the two, 1 Kings 12. 23, 24. The word of the Lord came to Shemaiah the man of God, saying, Returne every man to his house, for this thing is from the Lord. In the sense of the Prophet there, we may say that our Divisions are from the Lord. We are wrangling, devising, plotting, working one against another, minding nothing but to get the day one of another: but God is working out ends above our reach, for his glory and the good of his Saints. There must be Heresies, saies the Apostle, 1 Cor. 11.19. So there must be Divisions.
The word Heresies is used to signify several opinions, severall wayes, Heresies Platonica, Haresies Peripateetica. Chryfofome interprets the place of the Apostle, There must be Heresies, of such Divisions as we are treating of.

But why must there be Divisions, what does God ayme at in them?

Answ. First, the discovery of mens spirits, that they which are approved may be manifest, sayes the Apostle. By those divisions in Corinth, wherein the rich divided from the poore, whereby the poore were condemned, the graces of the poore in bearing this were manifested. Thus Chryfofome upon the place: The Apostle sayes this, That he might comfort the poor which were able with a generous minde to bear that contempt. The melting of the metall discovers the drosse, for they divide the one from the other. These are melting times, and thereby discovering times. If Reformation had gone on without opposition, we had not seen what drosse spirits we had amongst us. Those who have kept upright without warping in these times are honourable before God, and his holy Angels and Saints.

2. By these Divisions God exercises the graces of his servants. A little skill in a Mariner is enough to guide his Ship in faire weather: but when stormes arise, when the Seas swell and grow troublesome, then his skill is put to it. In these stormy troublesome times there had need be much wisdome, faith, love, humility, patience, selfe-deniall, meeknesse, all graces are put to it now, they had need put forth all their strenght, act with all their vigour; our graces had need be stirring, full of life and quicknesse now. God prizeth the exercife of the graces of his Saints at a very high rate. He thinks it worth their suffering much trouble. It is a good evidence of grace, yea of much grace, to account the trouble of many afflictions to be recompensed by the exercife of graces. In times of division men had need stirre up all their graces, and be very watchfull over their wayes, and waike exactly, be circumspect, accurate in their lives. Those who have not their hearts with them, have their eyes upon them, prying into them, watching for their halting. When there is siding there is much observing. Lord (sayes David, Psal. 27.11) teach me thy way, and lead me in a plain path because of mine enemies, so it is in your books; but you may reade it because of mine... mine observers: enemies are observers. Hence it was the policy of the Lacedaemonians always to send two Embassadours together which disagreed among themselves, that so they might mutually have an eye upon the actions of each other.

3. God will have these to be in just judgement to the wicked, that they may be a stumbling block to them who will not receive the truth in love. There are so many opinions, such divisions, so many Religions, say some, that we know not what to do. If your hearts be carnall, not loving the ways of God, not prizing spiritual things, not favouring the things of another world, these opinions, divisions, may be laid by God in judgement as a stumbling block in thy way, that thou mayest stumble upon them and break thy selfe for ever. God hath no need of thee: If thou wilt be froward and perverse against his truths, if thou hast a mind to take offence, you shall have matter enough before you to take offence at. Stumble and break your necks, as a just reward of the perverseness of your hearts. These divisions which you rejoice in, which you can speak of as glad that you have such an objection against my people and ways that your hearts are opposite to, shall cost you dear, even the perdition of your souls everlastingly.

It was a speech of Tertullian, I account it no danger to affirm, that God hath so ordered the revelation of truth in Scriptures, that he might administer matter for Hereticks.

4. God hath a hand in these Divisions, to bring forth further light. Sparkes are beaten out by the Flints striking together. Many sparks of light, many truths are beaten out by the beatings of mens spirits one against another. If light be let into a house, there must be some trouble to beat down a window. A child thinks the house is beating downe, but the father knowes the light will be worth the cost and trouble. If you will have the cloth woven, the Woofe and Warpe must be cast crosse one to another. If you will have truths argued out, you must be content to bear with some opposition for the time. Those who are not willing to bear some trouble, to be at some cost to find out truth, are not worthy of it. Those who love truth will seek for it, for truths sake, those who love victory, yet because the truth is the strongest, will seek after truth that they may get victory, Dan. 12.4. Many shall runne to and fro, and know-knowledge shall be encreased. To some these divisions darken truths, to others they enlighten them. We may well behold mens weakness in these divisions, but better admire Gods strength and wisdom in ordering them to his glory, and his childrens good.

Be not discouraged ye Saints of the Lord, at these divisions, your Father hath a hand in them, he wil bring good out of them. Yea Christ, who is the Prince of peace, hath a hand in them. Matth. 10.34,35. he says, Think not that I am come to send peace on the earth, I came to bring a sword. I am come to set a man at variance against his Father, and the Daughter against her Mother. One would think it to be the strangest speech that could be, to come from the mouth of him who is the great peace-maker. Oh blessed Saviour, must we not think that thou art come to send peace? Thou art our peace. Is not thine Embassage from thy Father, an Embassage of peace? True: peace with my Father, but not peace on the earth; not an earthly peace; do not think that I came from heaven to work this for men, that they should live at ease in plenty and pleasure, that they should have no disturbance, no trouble to the flesh: no, the event of my coming you will finde to be a sword, divisions, and that between those of the nearest relation. A child who is wicked will despise and break with his godly father, and the daughter with her godly mother. And Luke 12.53. the carnall father and mother will have their hearts rise against their godly sonne and daughter. I am come to send fire on the earth, and what will I if it be already kindled? Let it kindle as soone as it will, I am contented, I know much good will come of it. These Scriptures are enough to take away for ever the offence of divisions.

First, Christ himselfe is the greatest offence to wicked men that ever was in the world: he is the stumbling stone and rock of offence, thousand thousands being offended at him miscarry everlastingly. Christ foreseeing how many would be offended at him, Mar. 11.6. blesseth the man who shall not be offended. Some are offended at what they see in Christ; others apprehend whatsoever is in him to be most excellent and lovely, that which they cannot but defend and stand for to the death. He is disallowed of men, rejected by the builders, a stone of stumbling to them: but to the Saints the chief corner stone, elect, precious.
1 Pet. 2. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Such different apprehensions of Christ must needs divide men.

2. Christ comes to make the greatest alteration that ever was or can be in the world, and do we not finde that troubles accompany alterations, and above all alterations, alterations in government, and especially such a government as gives no composition, yeelds no compliance with any thing else? When Christ comes he brings his fanne in his hand, he must have his floore throughly purged; he gathers his wheat into his garner, & severs the chaffe to be burnt in unquenchable fire. If he comes thus, who shall abide his comming? Mal. 3. 2. Who shall stand when he appeares? for he is like a Refiner's fire, and Fullers fope, he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of foles, he that purifie the fons of Levi. Certainly there will be much ado when they come to be purified. No men in the world are like to make so much stirre when they come to be purified as the Clergy will. Christ comes to caft out Devils, they will fome, fret, vex, rend and teare when they are a calling out. The Gofpell likewise divides. The word of the Gofpell is a dividing word. Heb. 4. 11. It is quicke, powerfull, sharper then a two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soule and spirit, of the joints and marrow. It divides in a mans own heart, and divides between man and man. The light of it divides. The first division we ever read of was of Gods making, Gen. 1. 3, 4. When he said, Let there be light, and God divided the light from the darknes. The doctrine of the Gofpell fhes the spiritualnes of Gods commands, the sinfullnesse of thoughts, of the first stirrings of sin, Mat. 5. this touches to the quick.

The heat of the Gofpell divides: it is like fire when it comes, Is not my word like fire? The preaching of the Gofpell with power heaps coales of fire upon mens heads, which will either melt them, or burn them. In it there is a separation of the precious from the vile.

The Ordinances of the Gofpell divide, they difference men. Some they will receive, others they will not. They must bring men to a higher, to a stricter way than the sluggisht, dead, vain, flight, drosflie hearts of men are willing to come up unto.

The godliness that is in Christ Jesus divides, therefore whofeover will live godly so, must expect to suffer persecution, 2 Tim. 3. 12.
1. Those who hold forth the life and power of godliness, seem to challenge a more speciall peculiar interest in God then others which cannot be endured, 1 Job. 5. 19. We are of God, and the whole world lyes in wickednesse.

2. Their lives condemn others, which they cannot abide, as Noah is said to condemn the world, Heb. 11. 7.

3. In godliness there is an excellency. They whose hearts are naught cannot look upon that hath any appearance of excellency, without a spirit of envy. If they judge men only to be conceited with it as an excellency; but for their parts they think it not to be so, then they look upon them with a spirit of indignation.

4. Godliness make them zealous in such things as others can see no reason why they should. They think they do incalescere in re frigida, and that the ground of their zeal is vanity, and turbulency of spirit.

5. It makes men constant: nothing can turn them out of their way. The Son yeelds not to his Father, the Servant not to his Master; this is judged to be stoutnesse and wilfulness, though God knowes it is far otherwise, it must needs therefore enrage others at them.

The good uses that we are to make of our Divisions.

Why may not meat come out of the eater, and sweet out of these bitter things? The Heavens can draw up salt vapours from the Sea, and send them down againe in sweet refreshing showres. Why may not heavenly hearts change the very nature of these fowre brinish things, and make them sweet to themselves and others? This is the excellency of grace; it does not only preserve the soule from the evill of temptations, but it gets advantage by them, it turns the evill into good. Luther upon the Galat. c. 5. v. 17. hath a notable expression to set forth the power of grace: By this a Christian (sayes he) comes to be a mighty workman, and a wonderfull creator, who of heaviness can make joy, of terrors comfort, of sinne righteousness, of death life. And why may not I add, of division and contention, peace and union? Wherefore

First, by these Divisions men may come to see the vilenesse and the vanity of their own hearts: what were the thoughts of men men heretofore? Oh, had we but liberty and opportunity to be instrumentall for God, we hope we should improve all to the uttermost for him, now God hath granted these to us, we abuse them, we grow wanton, we jarre one against another: we are like some Marriners, who are calme in a storme, but storme in a calme. Surely every man is vanity. The untowardness of the spirits of those who heretofore longed after ordinances, freed from these defilements they mourned under, when they have their desires in great measure satisfied, discovers so much evill in the hearts of men, that it justly flies those whom themselves have had hard thoughts of, men who seemed carnall and naught, that you looked upon as very evill, men of bitter spirits against good men, you thought such things apparently: argued them void of grace, and yet when you are got into Church-fellowship, that way of freedome, that your soules mourned after a long time, now though you be joyned in covenant one to another, yet if your brethren differ any thing from you, though they be otherwise godly, what a bitterness of spirit is there in some of you against them! what pride! what frowardness do you manifest against them! Oh what a poor creature is man! if once he gets power and liberty, what a deale of filth appears in him! we may learn by this to have charitable thoughts of some, of whom we have had hard thoughts before; we see if these men have any grace, grace may be in a mans heart lying under much corruption.

Secondly, learne to be humbled for that dishonour which comes to God by these divisions; thou spendest thy time in vexing and fretting at, in crying out against these breaches, but when was thy heart broken with the dishonour that God hath by them?

Thirdly, let these divisions confirme us in the maine, and settle us there more then ever; for do we not see that those many sorts of men who are divided, who oppose one another much, yet they all joyn in the things of the greatest consequence, they all witness against the common enemy? This, fayas Nazianzen, is the greatest argument of the truth, that it is not overcome by time, neither can enmity one against another put out that little spärke of the love of it that is in us, &c. If a man's house stands after many shakings of strong windes, he concludes the foundation is good, this satisfies him, though some tiles be shaken off.

Fourthly, let us bless God who hath carried on the work of Reformation thus farre, notwithstanding our divisions; we were afraid that these differences, not so much between the good and bad, but between the good and good, would have undone all, and yet behold the Lord beyond our thoughts, how infinitely beyond our deserts, hath carried on the work hitherto, so as it gets ground, though it be not so speedily brought to an issue as we would have it.

Fiftly, let us hence raise our hopes in this, that Satan's time is not long; his raging and coming so violently, doth evidence it to us. Surely Christ our Prince of Peace is at hand, he will tread down Satan under our feet shortly.

Sixtly, let us from these stirs without, be put upon the labouring to make and to confirm peace within. Oh consider, is the breach between man and man so grievous? how grievous is that which is between God and the Soul! I find it hard, and doubt whether it be possible to be at peace with men in this world; I find them of such froward, peevish, selfish, wilful spirits, even many who seem to be good men otherwise, but God gives many encouragements to poor souls to come unto him; he is a God of love and mercy, he delights not to grieve the children of men, to crush under his feet the prisoners of the earth: he is willing to be reconciled to sinners: there is nothing that his heart is more set upon, then reconciliation with wretched sinful souls. Oh that in these sad days of miserable diffentions, I might be blessed with the comforts of the reconciliation of my soul with God! if this were, I hope I should be able contentedly to bear, and with strength to pass through all those heart-fadning evils caused by these breaches and diffentions there are amongst us. This were a good use indeed, made of such evil things, if mens contending with you shall thus further your peace with God; what he once said of Adams sin, it was Falix peccatum, a happy sin, because it occasioned so much good in Mans Redemption: So I may say of that strife and contention there is among us, it is Falix contentio, a happy contention, that God hath turned to so much good unto you.

I have read of Robert Holgate, who was Arch-Bishop of York, because because he could not peaceably enjoy his small living in Lin-colne-shire, in regard of the litigiousness of a neighbouring Knight, comming to London to right himselfe, he came into the favour of King Hen. the 8. and to got by degrees the Archbishopprick of York, he thought he got well by the litigiousness of this Knight; but if the strifes of men shall put thee upon those providences and duties which shall be so blessed unto thee, as to further thy getting into the favour of the high God, and the enjoyment of the soule-satisfying sweetnees there is in peace with him; what cause shalt thou have of admiring free grace, which hath brought to thee so great a good from so great arre-vil? and if these strifes have been a meanes to move thy heart Godward for thy making thy peace with him, let them also put thee on still to further, to confirme, to settle, to maintaine thy peace with him. VVhen the winde and storne rises, the Traveller plucks his cloak the closer about him; these dividing times are stormy times, labour to get your souls to the harbour under shelter, labour to make sure of that one thing necessary; the more strangely men looke upon you, let your hearts be stirred up to seek with the more strength the face of God, that you may never look upon it but with joy. You hear harsh notes abroad, such things as grieve you at the heart, labour so much the more to keep the bird alaways singing in your bosome.

7. If your peace be made with God, blesse God for it. It is a great mercy for a man in these times of trouble, to have rest in his own spirit; while others are tossed up and down in the waves of contention, you sit quietly in the Arke of a good conscience, blesse the Lord that ever you knew him and his ways.

8. Labour to make up your want of that good and comfort you heretofore had in Christian communion, with a more close and constant communion with the Lord, who hath been pleased to speak peace unto you. Although I have not that comfort in communion with the streams, yet I may find it fully made up in the fountain.

9. By way of Antiperistus, let us labour to be so much the more united with the Saints, by how much we see others to be divided: Men make void thy Law, sayes David, therefore doe
I love it above gold. We use to put a price upon things that are rare: what makes Jewels to be of that worth, but for the rarity of them? Unity, hearty love, sweetness of communion among brethren, is now a very rare thing, a scarce commodity, let us prize it the more, and you who do enjoy it, bless God for it.

10. The more confused, broken, and troublesome we see things to be, the more let our hearts be stirred up in prayer to God, putting him in mind of all those gracious promises that he hath made to his Church for peace and union: Lord is it not part of thy Covenant with thy people, that thou wilt give them one heart? hath the not said that they shall serve thee with one shoulder? hath thou not told us that thou wilt make Jerusalem a quiet habitation, that thou wilt take away violence, that there should be no prickling bryar nor grieving thorn?

11. Those whole consciences can witnesse to them, that it hath been their great care not to enwrap themselves in the guilt of these divisions, but they can appeale to God that they have endeavoured after peace so far as they could with a good conscience, let them bless God for this mercy, it is a great deliverance to be delivered from the guilt of those divisions. Deut. 33.8. Of Levi he said, Let thy Urim and Thummim be with thy holy One, whom thou didst prove at Massah, and with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah. Massah signifies tentation, and Meribah, contention. Places and times of contention are places and times of contention. Now if God shall prove us at those places in those times, and we be found upright, this will bring a blessing upon us. At those waters where the people murmured, contending even with God himselfe, Aaron (though there was some weakness in him) yet kept himselfe from being involved in the guilt of that sinne of contending with God. And Sol-Farchi, with other of the Hebrewes, say, that the Levites were not in that sinne neither; which they thinke that place Malachie 2. 5. refers unto. My covenant was with him of life and peace, for the feare wherewith he feared me, and was afraid before my name. The feare of God was upon Levi, at that time he dared not contend as then others did, and therefore my covenant of life and peace was and is with him. We have been these three or foure yeares at these waters of Massah and Meribah, God hath tryed us. How happy are those who have held out, who have kept their consciences free, upon whom the fear of God hath been, and through that fear of his, have walked before him in the ways of truth and equity? The blessing of the Covenant of Life and Peace be upon them for ever.

CHAP. XXXI.
The Cure of our Divisions.

What gracious heart is not cut asunder with griefe for those sore and fearfull evils that there are in, and come from our divisions, and is not even the second time cut asunder with carefull thoughts in it selfe, what may be done to heal them? Mat. 6.25. Christ forbids that carking care that cuts our hearts, when it is in matters concerning our selves, yea for our lives, μὴ μεθύσασθε, take no thought for your life, so it is in your bookes: but the word signifies, Doe not take such thought as should cut your hearts asunder: so v.28. τί μεθύσας; why doe you divide your hearts? and ver.31. μὴ μεθύσασθε, and ver. 34. μὴ μεθύσασθε again. But though this charge of Christ be doubled and doubled againe, against our carefull dividing cutting thoughts about our selves, yet for the uniting the hearts of the Saints together for the good of the Church, this heart-cutting care is not onely allowed, but required, Cor.14.25. That there should be no schisme in the body, but that the members should have the same care one for another. The words are, That the members may care the same thing one for another, and that with dividing, cutting care, that there might be no schisme in the body. The word that is here for care, is the same that in the former places in the 6. of Mat. is forbidden. The expressions of my thoughtfull cares about this work, is the subject at this time: When I set my self about it, my heart doth even ake within me at the apprehension of the difficulty of it. There are some diseases that are called opprobria medicorum, the disgraces of Physitians, because they know not what to say or doe to them; or if they do any thing it is to little purpose. If there be any soule-disease that is opprobrium Theologorum, the disgrace disgrace of Divines, it is this of contention and division. How little has all that they have studied and endeavoured to do, prevailed with the hearts of men? What shall we do? Shall we but joyn in this one thing, to sit down together, and mourn one over another, one for another, till we have dissolved our hearts into tears, and see if we can thus get them to run one into another? Oh that it might be, what sorrow for ever it costs us!

We read Judges 2.12,3,4,5. the Lord sent an Angell from Gilgal to the men of Israel, who told them how graciously he had dealt with them, yet they had contrary to the command of God made a league with the inhabitants of the Land, for which the Lord threatened that they should be as thorns in their sides. When the Angell spake these words to the children of Israel, the people lift up their voice and wept. And they called the name of that place Bochim, a place of tears. Their sin was too much joying, joying in league where God would not have them: those whom they joyned with, God told them should be thornes in their sides. Upon this they wept, and that so sore, that the place received its name from their weeping. But oh that the Lord would send his Angell, yea his Spirit to us, to convince us of our evil, that we to this day have not joyned in sure league one with another, but are thorns in the sides of one another: and that after so many mercies, such great deliverances from our bondage, from the rage of ungodly men, yea that we are so false one to another, though the Lord hath never broke covenant with us, which was the heart-breaking argument the Angell used, ver. 1. Yea the Lord hath done abundantly for us, beyond our hopes, desires, thoughts, and that after all this there should be nothing but breaches and divisions amongst us, that we should be not only thornes, but speares and swords in one anothers sides, piercing to one anothers hearts. Are we the children of Israel? Let our hearts then break for the breaches of our hearts. Let them break, and melt, and mourn, and bleed, and resolve that nothing shall comfort them, but peace with our God, and peace one with another.

That one Text, 1 Thes. 4.9. were enough alone to pierce our hearts through and through. As touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write unto you, faith the Apostle, for ye your selves are taught of God to love one another. Oh Lord, what are we in these dayes dayes such kinde of Christians as these were? Oh that it were so with us, that we had no need to be wrote to, to be preached to, concerning this. Does it appear by our carriages one towards another, that we are taught of God to love one another? But that God may teach us this day, attend to what shall be said to you in his name, which I shall cast into these five heads:

2. Joyning Principles.
2. Joyning Considerations.
5. Conclude with Exhortation.

Wherein we shall endeavour to set before you the beauty and excellency there is in the heart, union, and mutuall love of Christians.

I shall not need to be long in these: For take away Dividing Principles, Dividing Diftempers, Dividing Practices, and be thoroughly convinced of the evill of divisions, and one would think our hearts should of themselves run into one another. But that I may not seeme to leave our wounds open, so that aire should get into them, but endeavour the closing of them, and so the healing, I shall speak something to these five Heads:

The first joyning Principle.
In the midst of all differences of judgement, and weaknesses of the Saints, it is not impossible but that they may live in peace and love together.

If notwithstanding the differences from Gods mind, and many weaknesses, there may be peace and love between God & his Saints: then surely notwithstanding these things, the Saints may be at love and peace among themselves. Let this be laid for a ground, and let our hearts be much possesed with it, we shall finde it very helpfull to our closing. Away with that vain conceit which hath been the great disturber of Churches in all ages, if men differ in their judgement and practice in matters of religion, ligion, though it be in things that are but the weakness of godly men, yet there must needs be heart-burning and division. Let all peaceable men deny this consequence. Let us not say it will be so, and that our words may be made good afterwards indeed make it so: certainly the connection of them, if there be any, is rather from the corruption of our hearts, than from the nature of the things.

I have read of two Rivers in the East, Sava and Danuby, that run along in one channel three score miles together, without any noyse, and yet they keep themselves distinct, the colour of the waters remain distinct, all along: why should we not think it possible for us to go along close together in love and peace, though in some thing our judgments and practices be apparently different one from another? I will give you who are Scholars a sentence to write upon your Study doores, as needfull as one in these times as any; it is this:

Variety of opinions, and unity of those that hold them, may stand together.

There hath been much ado to get us to agree: we laboured to get our opinions into one, but they will not come together. It may be in our endeavours for agreement we have begun at the wrong end. Let us try what we can do at the other end: it may be we shall have better success there. Let us labour to joyn our hearts to engage our affections one to another: if we cannot be of one mind that we may agree, let us agree that we may be of one minde.

Eusebius records a Letter that Constantine sent to Alexander and Arian, before he apprehended the grossenesse of Arian his life of Con- herezie, conceiving them to differ but in smaller things, he endeavours to reconcile them: For that (fayes he) the things where- in you differ, concerneth not any mightie substance of our Religion, there is no reason why it should breed at all any division in minde, or discord in doctrine; and this I say not to compel you in this light question, of what sort soever it be, altogether to condescend unto the same sentence and though you dissent amongst your selves about a matter of small importance, (for neither truly are we all in all things like minded, neither have we all the same nature and gift engrailed Engrafted in us) nevertheless for all that the sacred unity may be soundly and inviolably retained among you, and one consent and fellowship conversed between all.
Quanquam in corne non potuit plane convenire num verum corpus & spiritus Christi paene & vino corporaliiter inibi, debet nihilominus utrque pars altera erga alteram de lato et rare Christi charitate, quatenus id omnio sicut jusque confirmitur ferre perfectissimis Colloqu. Marburg. This subscrib'd by Luther, Melanthon, Oecolampadius, Bremius, Osiander, Zuilingius, Bucer, and others.

I have read of the like peaceable disposition in divers German Divines, meeting to confer about matters of Religion in difference, in Marburg. The conclusion of their Conference was this: Although we see we cannot hitherto fully agree about the corporall presence of the body and blood of Christ in the bread and wine, yet both parts ought to declare Christian love one to another, as farre as everyone can with a good conscience. Oh that this were the conclusion of all our debates and conference, wherein we cannot come up fully to one anothers judgements. If we stay for peace and love till we come to the unity of the faith in all things, we must stay for it, for ought I know, till we come to another world. Ephes. 4. 11, 12. He gave some Apostles, some Evangelists, some Pastors and Teachers, for the worke of the Ministry, till we all come in the unity of the faith, and knowledge of the Sonne of God, unto a perfect man. The unity of the faith, and the perfect man will be both together; and when they are, there will be no more need of any ministry, there shall be no more preaching after we are all come to this unity: when that is done, our work is done for this world.

The second joyning Principle.

That shall never be got by strife, that may be had by love and peace.

We would all fain have our wills: now that which lies uppermost upon many mens hearts, that which is the first thing they do, if their wills be crossed, is presently to strive and contend: but this should be the last thing, after all other means are tried: this should never be made use of but in case of pure necessity. We should first think, Is there any way in the world whereby it is possible we may have our desires satisfied with peace, let us try this, and another way, a third, a fourth, yea a hundred ways, if they lye between us and the way of strife, before we come to meddle with that. This rule you will find of very great use to order all our business in Churches & Com-
Common-wealths, of Townes, Families, yea whatsoever concerns any of your persons in reference to any other. The Apostle, 1 Cor. 12, rebuking the divisions of that Church, of which they are guilty more then any, for they had many among them of raised parts, of eminent gifts, and therefore puffed up more then others. Except God joyes eminency of grace, men of eminent gifts joyne lesse then others, whose gifts are meaner. Among those means he directs for union, when he speaks of love: *I will shew you, saies he, a more excellent way, ver. last; καὶ ἐνενόηκα διὸν, a way of the highest excellency, beyond any expression. The way of love, of the engaging hearts one to another, is the only way to bring men to unity of judgement: yea the only way when all is done, for men to have their wills. I may give you this or the other rule to bring you to think and do the same thing, but that which hath an excellency in it with an Hyperbole, is the way of love. If you could get your minds by other ways, certainly you cannot enjoy it with that sweetnesse and comfort as you may if you have got it this way.

Marcus Cato repented that ever he went by sea when he might have gone by land (it seems the skill of those times for Navigation was not great) but certainly there is no man living but hath cause to repent him that ever he got that by strife & contention that he might have got by love & peace. What hinders why soft and gentle words may not prevaile, as well as hard and bitter language? Why may not a loving winning carriage do as much as severe rigid violence? If it may, thou providest ill for thine own peace and comfort, to leave this way and betake thy self to the other. Tell me, were it a signe of valour in a man to draw his sword at every Whappet that comes near him? yea at every Fly that lights upon him? Were it not folly and madness? Why he may by putting forth his finger put them off from him. Thy forward choleric spirit is ready to draw at everything that thou likest not. This is thy folly: thou mayest with lesse ado, have what thou haft a minde to. If I would put a Feather from me, I need not strike violently at it, a soft gentle breath will do it better. Why should a man labour and toyle till he sweats again, to take up a pin? Have none of you sometimes made a great stirre in your families about that which when the stir is a little over

you plainly see you might have had as well with a word speaking: and hath not your heart secretly upbraided you then? Try the next time what you can do by faire and gentle means. Why should we let the strength of our spirits run waste? Let this be a constant rule; never make use of severity till you have tried what clemency will do: there is more power in that to conquer the hearts of men you would faine have yeild to you, then you are aware of.

Plutarch reports of Philip of Macedon, that when one Arcadion railed on him, the Courtiers would have had him dealt severely with; but Philip took another course, he sends for him, and spake gently to him, and shewed great love and respect to him: upon this Arcadion heart was turned, so as there was no man in the world that Arcadion spoke more honourably of then of Philip, wheresoever he came. After a while Philip met with those who would have had him to have revenged himself upon Arcadion. What say you now of Arcadion? sayes he: How doth he now behave himself? There is no man living, say they, speaks better of you now then he. Well then, sayes Philip, I am a better Physitian then you; my physick hath done that which yours never would have done.

The like he reports of Fabius, who was called the Romans Target: When he heard of a soouldier who was valiant, yet practised with some others to go and serve the enemy, he calls him to him, and in stead of dealing with him in rigour, tells him he had not had recompense according to his desert, and gives him honourable gifts, and so gains him to be faithfull for ever. And sayes he, As Hunters, Riders of Horses, and such as tame wilde beasts shall sooner make them leave their savage and churlish nature by gentle usage and manning of them, then by beating and brandling them; so a governour of men should rather correct by patience, gentlenesse, and clemency, then by rigour, violence, and severity. None but a cruel, harsh, fordid spirited man, will say, I had rather men should fear me then love me: God prizes most what he hath from us by love.
The third joyning Principle.

It is better to doe good, then to receive good.

Active good is better than passive; only God himselfe, his Angels and Saints do good; all creatures can receive good. This principle would quickly joyne us; for if this were in mens hearts, they would study to do all the good they could to one another, and so gaine upon one anothers hearts: and the more good we doe to any, the more will our hearts be inclinable to love them. The very communication of goodnesse, if it be out of a good spirit, carres the heart along with it to the subject this good is communicated to: the more good God doth to any, the more he loves them. God hates nothing that he hath made, but loves what there is in any thing of his work: but when he communicates his grace, his Spirit, when he gives his Christ in these gifts, he gives his heart: they do not only come from love, but they make the subject further lovely in his eyes. So it is with us in our proportion: if you take a poore childe from the dung-hill, or out of the Almes-houfe, and make him your heyre, you do not only do this good to him because you love him, but you also love him more, because you look upon him as an object of your goodnesse as one raised by you. Titus accounted that day lost, a day wherein he had not raigned, if he had done no good. This principle would make men great as well as good. It is the glory of God that he does so much good. And if men could account this greatnesse, satisfying greatnesse, the most and greatest contentions that are in the world would be layd down: for what do men contend so much for as for greatnesse?

The fourth joyning Principle.

The good of other men is my good as well as theirs.

We are all of one body: whatsoever good others have, it is the good of the body; it makes them some way able to doe that good that we would have done, or at least that we should desire to have done. Plutarch sayes that Solon made a law whereby whereby every man was enabled to sue whoever wronged his neighbour, as if he had wronged himself; he gave this reason for it, There is no good that one man has in a Common-wealth, but it is another mans as well as his.

Community in the Church is more. 1 Cor. 3. 22. Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours, you are Christ's, and Christ is Gods. If you be godly you have an interest in all the eminent godly men in the world, in all their gifts, their graces, in all they have or do; all that is in the world that hath any good in it, is yours, yea what is evil shall be serviceable to you for good. This is brought by the Apostle to quiet the jars and contentions that were amongst the Corinthians. One would be for Paul, another for Apollos, saith the Apostle, What need this contention, who you are for, and who another is for? they are all yours, all the excellency there is in them is the good of every one of you. A special reason why men contend so much, is, they think the good that other men have is their evil, therefore they must either get it to themselves, or darken it in those that have it. But such men acted by such a principle are poore, low-spirited men. A man of a raised, enlarged spirit, opens his heart that it may be filled with that infinite good in which there is all good. Now if it be that good my soul closeth with, and is satisfied in, then whatsoever hath any goodness in it, be it where it will, it flows from this Infinite Ocean of good that my soul is launched into, and some way or other flows into this again; though thorough mens corruptions, there may be windings and turnings in the course of it, yet hither it comes at last, and therefore it is mine as really and truly as any I have in mine own hand: my soul then shall rejoice in all the good I see my brethren have, in all they do, I will bless God for it, and seek the furtherance of it what I can. Surely this man must needs be a man of peace and love.
The fifth joining Principle.
My good is more in the publique then in my selfe.

The strength, safety, excellency of a Cabbin in a Ship consists not so much in the boards of the Cabbin, or the fine painting of it, as in the strength and excellency of the ship.

It is because we have such private spirits that there are such contentions among us: were we more publique spirited, our contentions would vanish. When I read of what publique spirits many of the Heathen were, I am ashamed to look upon many Christians. Paulus Aemilius hearing of the death of his children, spake with undaunted courage thus, That the Gods had heard his prayer, which was, that calamities should rather befall his family, then the Common-wealth. The publkeness of his spirit made it very sweet and lovely: the story fayes of him, he intreated them gently and graciously whom he had subdued, setting forward their causes, even as they had bin his confederates, very friends and neer kindmen. Publique spirited men are men of sweet and peaceable spirits.

The sixth joining Principle.
What I would have others doe to me, that will I endeavour to doe to them.

Would not I have others beare with me? I then will bear with them. I would have others do offices of kindnesse to me, I will then do offices of kindnesse to them. I would have the carriages of others lovely, amiable to me, mine shall be so to them. I would have others live peaceably with me, I will do so with them. This rule of doing to others as I would be done to, is a law of justice; such justice as keeps the peace.

Alexander Severus the Roman Emperour, was much taken with this: he fayes he learned it from the Christians, if he had to deal with his common Souldiers that did wrong, he punish ed them: but when he had to deal with men of worth and dignity, he thought it sufficient to reprove them with this sentence, Do as ye would be done by.

Chrysostome in his 13. Sermon to the people of Antioch, makes makes use of this principle, thus. After Christ had spoken of many blessednesses, (fayes he) then he sayes, "Those things you would have others to do to you, do you to them: as if he should say, There needs not many words, let thine own will be thy law: would you receive benefits? bestow benefits then: would you have mercy? be merciful then: would you be commended? commend others: would you be loved? then love. Be you the Judge your selfe, be you the Law-giver of your owne life. That which you hate, do not to another. Cannot you endure reproach? do not you reproach others. Cannot you endure to have others envy you? do not you envy others. Cannot you endure to be deceived? do not you deceive others.

The seventh joining Principle.
It is as great an honour to have my will by yeelding, as by over-comming.

Any men in their anger will say, I will be even with him. I will tell you a way how you may be above him: forgive him. By yeelding, pardoning, putting up the wrong, you shew you have power over your self, and this is a greater thing then to have power over another. Numb. 14.17, 18. Now I beseech thee let the power of my Lord be great, pardon. I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people, ver. 19. and by this thou maist honourably prevale with thy Brother: hereby shalt thou heap coals of fire upon his head.

I have read of two famous Philosophers falling at variance Aristippus and Aeschines, Aristippus comes to Aeschines, Shall we not be friends? fayes he. Yes with all my heart faith Aeschines. Remember, faith Aristippus, that though I am your elder, yet I sought for peace. True, faith Aeschines, and for this I will alwayes acknowledge you the more worthy man; for I began the strife, and you the peace.

The eighth joining Principle.
I will never meddle with any strife but that which shall have peace to the end of it.

No war is good upon any terms, taken up upon the juifest ground, except it aymes at peace. Bellum minime bellum: that that Souldier is a murthener that sheds bloud not in reference to peace. The Swords and Ensignes of Souldiers should have this Motto upon them, Sic quvirmus pacem, Thus we seek Peace. Hercules his Club was made of the Olive, the emblem of Peace.

The ninth joyning Principle.

No man shall ever be mine enemy, that is not more his owne then mine.

If a man offends me meerly through weakness, this is his affliction, in this he is not an enemy to himself nor me; he mourns for it, and I will pitty him in his mourning; he is more troubled for what he hath done, then I have cause to be for what I have suffered. If he offends willingly and purposely, he is his own enemy more then mine. When Latimer was confened in buying a commodity, his friends telling him how he was cheated of his money, he fell a mourning for him that had cheated him, He hath the worst of it, sayes he. If my heart rises against a man in this, and I seek to oppose him in his way, it may very well be interpreted to be out of love to him, for my heart rises against his enemy, I oppose his enemy, even himself, but an enemy to himself, more then to me; he hath hurt me a little, but himself more. I am troubled a little for the wrong I suffer, but more for the evill he hath done. If his wayes be enmity to God, I will oppose him, because I love God, and no farther then wherein I may manifest my love to God rather then hatred of him. When Servetus condemned Zuinglius for his harshnes, he answers, In other things I will be milde, but not so in Blasphemies against God. Let us keep our enmity within these bounds, and the peace of God will not be broke.

I had rather suffer the greatest evill, then doe the least.

If when others wrong you, you care not what you do to right your self: This is your folly and madness, Such a one hurt me, and I will therefore mischief my self; he hath pricked me with a pin, and I will therefore in an anger run my knife into my side. If in all we suffer we be sure to keep from righting our selves selves by any ways of sin, there will not be much peace broke. Such an one is thine enemy, and wilt thou of one enemy make two? wilt thou also be an enemy to thy self, yea a greater enemy then he or any man living can be to thee? for all the men in the world cannot make thee sin, except thou wilt thy self.

The eleventh joyning Principle.
I will labour to do good to all, but provoke none.

A Father hath not so much power over his child, as to provoke him. Col. 3.21. Fathers provoke not your children to wrath. Surely if a man hath not this power over his child, he hath it not over his friend, his neighbour, much less his superiour: yet how many take delight in this, Such a thing I know will anger him, and he shall be sure to have it! Oh wicked heart! dost thou see that this will be a temptation to thy brother, and wilt thou lay it before him? dost thou not pray for thy self and for him, Lord lead us not into temptation? we should account it the greatest evil to us of all the evil of afflictions, to be any occasion of sin to our brother; but what an evil should this be to us, to provoke our brother to sin? if we will needs be provoking, then let the Apostles exhortation prevail with us, Heb. 10.24. Let us consider one another to provoke unto love, and to good works: Let us not consider one another in a way of curiosity and emulation, to envy, or find fault with one another, from whence frowardness, pride, hatred, dissensions, factions may arise, saith Hyperius upon the place, but consider one another, so as we may further the good of one another, so as to make one another quick and active in that which is good.

The twelfth joyning Principle.
Peace with all men it is good, but with God and mine own conscience it is necessary.

But how will this joyn us one to another?

Answer. Very much, both as it holds forth the goodness of peace with all men, and as it carryes the heart strongly to the making and keeping peace with God and a mans own conscience. This peace with God and a mans own conscience will so sweeten the heart, that it cannot but be sweet towards every one; a man who hath satisfaction enough within, can easily bear afflictions and troubles that come without. When Saul had made great breaches between God and his soul, and in his own conscience, then he grew to be of a very froward spirit towards every man, before his Apostacy he was of a very meek and quiet spirit, but this fowred his spirit, and made it grow harsh, rugged, and cruel; This is the cause of the frowardness of many men and women in their families, and with their neighbours, there are secret breaches between God and their own consciences.

The thirteenth joyning Principle.

If I must needs err, considering what our condition is here in this world, I will rather err by too much gentleness and mildnesse, then by too much rigour and severity.

Mans nature is more propens to rigour, then to lenity; but the account of overmuch lenity is easier then of too much rigour. Men who are of harsh, sour spirits themselves, are ready to think that God is so too. As the Lacedamonsians, because they were of a warlike disposition, they represented their Gods all armed. But God is love: there is anger and hatred in God as well as love: but God is never said to be anger or hatred, no not justice it self; but he loves that expression of himself to the children of men, God is love. If God intended that all things amongst men, either in Church or Common-wealth, should be carried with strictnesse of justice, he would rather have governed his Church and the World by Angels, who have right apprehensions of justice, who are themselves perfect, altogether free from those evils that are to be punished, then by men, whose apprehensions of justice are exceeding weak, unconstant, partiall, as often false as true, and have much of that evill in themselves that they judge in others.
The last joyning Principle.

Peace is never bought too deare, but by sin and baseness.

We use to say, We may buy Gold too deare, and so we may Peace: but whatsoever we pay for it beside sinne and baseness, we have a good bargain. Snidas tells of the Emperor Trajan, that he would cut his own cloathes to binde up the wounds of his Souldiers. We should be very pitifull to souldiers, who are wounded to keep us whole. We should binde up their wounds, though it cost us dear: but especially our care should be to bind up those wounds that by divisions are made in Church and Common-wealth: and well may we be willing to cut our cloathes to binde them up, when the evil of them is such as either does or should cut our hearts. But though peace be a rich merchandize, yet we must not saile too far for it, nor so farre as to sinne. We read 2 Kings 23. 13. Mount Olivet is called the Mount of corruption, because of the Idolatry committed upon it. Though we are to prize Mount Olivet at a very high rate, with the Olives growing upon it, yet we must take heed that we make it not a Mount of corruption. We may give peace to buy truth, but we may not give truth to buy peace. We may be bold with that which is our own to purchase peace, but not with that which is Gods: yet we must not be base in our yielding in things naturall or civill for peace sake, that is,

First, we must not for our own private peace yield to that which is like to prove publique disadvantage and disturbance. There is a notable story of a Turkish Emperour, perceiving his Nobles & people to be offended that he was so strongly in love to his Concubine Irene, his heart was so taken with her that he grieved & was in his regard to the Stern of the State. Nothing must be done but as Irene would have it: whatsoever resolutions there were of any good to the State, yet Irene must be consulted withall before they were put in execution, & if they pleased not her all was dashed, so much did he dote upon Irene. This the Nobles and State could not bear: he therefore at last so far considered the publique, as he overcame his doting affections. He brought Irene before them, and sayes, That ye may see how much I prize the content of my people, I sacrifice her to them, and so drew his sword, and flew her with his own hands before their eyes. If according to her demerits for drawing his heart away from the good of the Common-wealth, she had bin given up to the sword of justice, it might have satisfied as well. But left I be thought to be too literall, give me leave to allegorize upon this Irene. Her name is a Greek name, Εἰρήνη, it signifies peace: we must not so dote upon our Irene, our private peace, that the publique should suffer for the sake of it. This is baseness: let her be sacrificed for publique good; this is true generousness.

Secondly, that is baseness, when our yeilding is thorough ignorance, cowardize, base fear, not from a principle of wisdom and understanding: not so much out of true love to peace, as a foolish, ignorant, fottish, fordid spirit of our own: whereas had we had a spirit of wisdom and courage, we might have peace upon more honourable terms. Indeed many think every kinde of yeilding baseness, but they are for the most part such as are not put to any great triall themselves. But when our consciences tell us, that what we do is what the rule allows us; it is not because we would avoyd trouble, but we find thorough Gods grace, our hearts in some measure prepared for suffering, if God were pleased to call us to it, in any thing wherein he may have glory, and the publique may be benefited. But because all things duly considered, we see that God in such a way shall have more glory, and our brethren generally more good: therefore whatsoever becomes of our particular in regard of esteem, or other wayes, we are willing to yeild, and in this we finde our hearts as much closing with God, enjoying Communion with him in all holinesse and godly fear, and in other things that go as near to us, we are able to deny our selves as much as ever: in this we may have comfort, that it is not baseness that makes us yeild, but rather the grace of God enabling us to rule over our own spirits. The peace that we thus purchase with the suffering much in our names, and the loss of many comforts does not cost us too dear.
CAP. XXXII.

Joyning Considerations.

The first. The consideration of the many things wherein God hath joyned us.

God hath joyned us together as we are men: we are not dogs, not wolves, let us not be so one to another. Acts 7:26.

Moses speaks thus to those who strife one with another: Sirs, ye are brethren, why do ye wrong one another? The words in the Greek are, ἀδελφοὶ ἦσε, men yet are brethren. There is a consideration in this, that ye are men: if there were no more, yet ye should not strive one with another, but much more considering ye are brethren. If we be men, let us be humane. What is the meaning of humanity, but courteousness, gentleness, pleasantness in our carriages one towards another? But still the consideration growes higher, as we are the same Country-men, of old acquaintance, in the same implantation, of the same family and kindred, but above all, joyned in such a blessed root, the fountain of all love and peace. Ephes. 4:4. presents this consideration most fully to us. The reason the Apostle gives why we must keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, is, because there is one body, and one spirit, ye are called in one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all. Here you have seven Ones together in two or three lines. It is very much that the spirit of God should joyn so close together seven Ones; surely it is to be a strong argument for us to unity.

First, one Body. The meanest member yet it is in the body. Is it comely for the body of Christ to be rent and torn? any reference to Christ might perswade unity, but union with Christ as the members with the body, what heart can stand against the strength of this? What can cause one member to tear and rend another, but madness?

2. One Spirit, 1 Cor. 12:11. that one and the self same spirit: he does not only say, The same spirit; but, The self same spirit: and as if that not enough, he addes One to the self same; and that yet not enough, he fayes; That one, all this is in the Greek, ἕν καὶ ἕν πνεῦμα. The repeating the Article hath a great elegance.
elegancy in it. And is not this one Spirit the Spirit of love and meekness? What does a froward contentious spirit do in thee, who profeffed thy self to be a Christian? What, saies Cyprian, does the fierceness of Wolves, the madness of Dogs, the deadly poyson of Serpents, the bloudy rage of Beasts, in a Christians breast?

3. Called in one hope. Are not you heyres, joynt heyres of the same Kingdome, and do you contend as if one belonged to the kingdome of light, and the other to the kingdome of darkness?

4. One Lord. You serve the same Lord and Master. Is it for the credit of a Master, that his servants are always wrangling and fighting one with another? Is it not a tedious thing in a family that the servants can never agree? Mark how ill the Lord takes this, Mat. 24. 49, 50, 51. that evil servant who begins to finite his fellow-servants, provokes his Lord against him so as to come upon him with such severity as to cut him asunder, and to appoint his portion with the Hypocrites; \( \text{Lysid facit in petore Christiano luperum fe-ristas? cacum rabies? venenum lechale serpem? cruenta ven-} \text{tia beffiarum? Cypr. de unitate Eccles. Num. 29.} \)

5. One Faith. What though we agree not together in some things of lesser moment, yet we agree in one faith. Why should we not then keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace? The agreement in the faith one would think should swallow up all other disagreements. We should rather bless God for keeping ing men found in the faith, then contend with them for lesser mistakes. When the Pharisees, Acts 23.9. understood that Paul agreed with them in that great doctrine of the Resurrection, they presently overlooked his other differences, saying, we finde no evill in this man. Our Brethren agree with us in more Fundamentals then this, and yet we can finde evill in them, and aggravate their evill beyond what it is, and improve it all we can against them. This is worse then Pharisaical.

Mister Calvin in his Epistle to our Countreymen at Frankford, fled for their lives in witness to the truth, yet miserably jarring and contending one against another there, to the scandal of all the Churches of God in those parts, begins his Epistle thus: This doth grievously torment me; it is extremely absurd that dissentions should arise amongst brethren, exiles, fled from their country for the same faith, and for that cause which alone in this your scattering ought to be to you as a holy band, to keep you fast bound together. Their contentions were about Church-worship.

6. One Baptisme. We are baptised into Christ's death, and is not that to shew that we should be dead to all those things in the world that cause strife and contention among men? Our Baptisme is our badge, our livery, it furthers somewhat the unity of servants that they weare all one livery.

7. One God. Though there be three persons in the Divine Nature, and every person is God, yet there is but one God; here is an union infinitely beyond all unions that any creature can be capable of; the mystery of this union is revealed to us, to make us in love with union. Our interest in this one God is such a conjunction, as nothing can be more.

Josephs brethren, Gen. 50.17. looked upon this, as having very great power in it to make up all breaches, to heal all old grudges. After their Father was dead, their confciences misgave them for what they had done to Joseph, they were afraid old matters would break forth, and that Joseph would turn their enemy; now how do they seek to unite Josephs heart to them? We pray thee, say they, forgive the trespass of the servants of the God of thy Father, and the Text sayes, Joseph wept when they spake unto him. Oh this was a heart-breaking speech to Joseph. The servants of the God of my Father; Shall my heart ever be estranged stranged from the servants of the God of my Father? The Lord forbid. This offence indeed was great, but their God is my God, & he was my Father's God; this argument had more in it to draw Joseph's heart to them, then if they had said, We are your brethren, we came from the same loynes you did: True, that is something, but the servants of the God of thy Father is much more. Let us look upon all the godly, though they have many weaknesses, though they have not carried themselves towards us as they ought, yet they are the servants, yea the children of our God, and of our fathers God; let this draw our hearts to them. If they be one with us, in their interest in one God, let them be one with us in the affections of our heart, to love them, delight in them, and rejoice in communion with them.

One God and Father. Mal. 2. 10. Have we not all one Father? hath not one God created us? why do we deal treacherously every man against his brother? Job 31. 15. Did not he that made me in the wombe, make him? and did not one fashion us in the wombe? Is it seemly that one mans children should be always contending, quarrelling and mischieving one another? do you think this is pleasing to your Father? It follows in that 4. of Ephes, who is above all, and through all, and in all. You have enough in your Father to satisfy your soules for ever, whatsoever you want other ways; he is above all; he that is so glorious and blessed, infinitely above all things, hath put honour enough upon you, that he is your Father; why will you contend and quarrel about trifles? He hath absolute authority to dispose of all things as he pleaseth; let not the different administrations of his, to some in one kinde, to some in another, be matter for you to contend about. And he worketh in all.

Those gifts and graces especially that are in his children, are his workings; that some have more then others, it is from his working: You may see the workings of your Father in the hearts of your Brethren. He is in all. Men may have children in whom little or nothing of their Father appeares, but God is in all his children, notwithstanding all their weaknesses, therefore our hearts should be in them and with them. This Scripture is one of the most famous Scriptures for the union of the Saints in one, that we have in all the book of God.

You will say, If indeed we could see God in such, if we we could see grace and holiness in them, our hearts would close with them, but we see not this.

1. Take heed thou dost not reject any from being thy brother, whom Jesus Christ at the great day will own for his, and God the Father will call Child.

2. Suppose thou canst not be satisfied in their godliness, yet the gifts of the Spirit of God that are in them, should cause some kind of closing; common gifts are of a middle nature, between nature and grace, as the spirits of a man are neither of the same nature with the soul, nor of the body, but between both, and serve to unite the soul and body together, which otherwise are of natures very different. The common gifts that men who are not yet sanctified have, may and should cause some union between the godly and them while they live in this world, so far as to be useful one to another in what God hath given them.

The second joining Consideration:
Let us consider how farre we can agree.

We differ thus and thus, but what doe we agree in? doe we not agree in things enough, wherein we may all the dayes of our lives spend all the strength we have in glorifying God together? Many men are of such spirits as they love to be altogether busied about their brethrens differences; their discourse, their pens, and all their wayes are about these, and that not to heale them, but rather to widen them. You shall not hear them speak of, or meddle with their agreements; their strength is not bent to heighten and strengthen them: if at any time they do take notice of their agreements, it is to make advantage of them: to render their disagreements the more odious, or to strengthen themselves in what they differ from them; they desire to get in men, and to get from them, only to serve their owne turnes upon them, this is an evil spirit. No maruaile therefore though some be so loath to discover to them how near they can come to him.

Pliny tells us of Apelles, that drawing the face of Antiochus the King who had but one eye, that he might hide this deformity, he deviled to paint him turning his visage a little away, so he shewed but the one side of his face: and from him, fayes Pliny, came the invention first of concealing the defects and blemishes of the visage. But the Painters of our time are quite in another way, if there be any deformity or defect on any side, they will be sure to paint that side in all the lineaments of it, that must be set forth fully to the view of all men; yea if it may be made to look more ugly and monstrous then it is, all the skill they have shall be improved to do it. But my brethren, this ought not to be, God doth not with us: he takes notice of the good of his children, but conceals their evil. There was but one good word in Sarah's speech to Abraham; Gen. 18. 12. She called him Lord, the speech otherwise was a speech of unbelief, yet the holy Ghost speaking afterwards of her, in reference to that speech, 1 Pet. 3. 6. conceals all the evil in it, and mentions only that reverend title she gave to her husband, commending her for it. Thus should we do: had we peaceable hearts thus we would do: all the good of our brethren we would improve to the uttermost, and what is evil, so far as with a good conscience we might, we could conceal. When I shall see this temper in mens spirits, I shall hope there will be peace.

The third joyning Consideration:

Let us consider of mens tempers, spirits, temptations, education, yeeres, gifts.

There must be a due consideration of all these, and we must indulge something to them all. This would allay much strife: as we read Num. 31. 23. Every thing that may abide the fire, ye shall make it goe thorough the fire, and all that abideth not the fire ye shall make goe thorough the water. We must deal with every man according to his temper. Some men are by their complexions of a more harsh and rugged temper then others. Consider what is the best way of dealing with such: in the main they are faithful and useful, they will joyn with you there, and spend their lives for you: if the harshness of their natures cause some excrescencies, unpleasing carriages, consider their tempers, though no evil in them is to be justified, yet deal tenderly with them, indulge them what lawfully you may. Some mens spirits, though upright to God and you, yet they have a servor in them that is not qualified with that wisdome, meekness.

Na
neffe, humility, as they ought, do not presently take these advantages against them, that they in their heat may perhaps give you; do not fly upon them as if those unjustifiable expressions that come from them, came from a spirit of malignity: You know the man and the manner of his communication; pass by weaknesses, accept of uprightneffe. Some mens temptation are very strong; it may be their hearts are pressed with disappointments, it may be they are pricked with the want of many comforts you have; they have family-temptations, and personall temptations that you are freed from: you do not know what you might doe if you were under the like temptations. Bless God that you are delivered from them; but do not adde to your brethrens affliction, by taking advantages against them, but according to the rule of the Apostle, Gal. 6.1. If a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such a one in the spirit of meekness, considering thy selfe left thou also be tempted. Beare ye one anotheres burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. Consider their education. Some men have been brought up altogether amongst Prelatical men, perhaps among Papists; some all their dayes have lived in wicked families, they never were acquainted with the society of the Saints, with that way of godlineffe that hath the most strictnesse and power in it. You must not deale with them for all things you see amisse in them, in the same way you would deale with such who have had godly education, who have had acquaintance with the most strict and powerfull wayes of godlineffe, but now manifest a spirit against them.

Consider mens yeares: old age looks for respect, and justly; especially such as have gone through the brunt and suffered much for your good: though some infirmities should break forth that are incident to old age, we must cover and passe by what we can, not forgetting that reverent respect that is due to the hoary head found in the way of godlineffe. Consider mens gifts: it may be they are not able to rise to your height, to understand what you do; thank God for your strength, but be not angry with your brother because he is weaker. This was one of the arguments for peace that Constantine in that forementioned Letter of his to Alexander and Arius, used. we are not in all things like minded, neither have we all the same nature and gift engraffed in us.
The Evill of our Times.

The fourth joyning Consideration.

What we get by contention will never quit cost.

A Merchant thinks it an ill venture, if when he casts up his accounts he finds the charge of his voyage rises to more than his incomes. If thou hast so much command of thy spirit, if thou canst so farre overcome thy passions as to get a time in coole blood to cast up thy accounts truly, what good thou hast done, or what thou hast got by such and such contentions, and on the other side cast up what the hurt thou hast done, what sin hath been committed, what evill hath got into thy spirit, I fear you will have little cause to boast of, or rejoyce in your gains. To be Dispensio littis freed from that expence that comes in by strife, is not a little gain, says Ambrose. In strife you will finde there is a very great expence of time, of gifts, and parts. Many men in regard of the good gifts God hath given them, might have proved shining Lights in the Church, but by reason of their contentious spirits, they prove no other then smoaking firebrands. It may be by all the stirre you keep you shall never get your minde; if you do, it will not quit cost; the charge you have been at for it, comes to much more then it is worth. God deliver me from having my minde at such a dear rate.

The fifth joyning Consideration.
The strongest hath need of the weakest.

L Et not the hand say, it hath no need of the foot; nor the eye, it hath no need of the hand; God hath so tempred the body, that every member hath need of every member.

It was a sweet spirit in Peter, that great Apostle, writing to the scattered Christians, he begins his Epistle thus: Simon Peter a servant and an Apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us. Little nayles may be usefull, where great wedges can do no good. Little chips may help to set great logs on fire.
The sixth.
Consider when any thing falls out that occasions strife, it may be this is but for a trial, this is a temptation.

When men provoke us we are ready to flye upon them, looking no further then the men with whom we are displeased. But if you look a little further, perhaps you may see the Devill is on the other side of the hedge, and hath been the chief agent in this business. Augustine presseth this by a most excellent similitude. When a Fowler, faith he, hath set his net to catch Birds, he sets it at a distance from the hedge, and when he has done he takes stones and throwes at the hedge, upon this the Birds flye out, and flutter about. The Fowler does not intend any hurt to the hedge, neither does he think to hit any Birds with his stones, but that which is in his eye is the net on the other side of the hedge, he hopes to drive the Birds in there. So fayes he, the Devill prepares his net to catch men in, he raises up contentions, and causes much trouble to be in Churches, and among brethren, you think all the evil is in the trouble of your present contentions. Oh no: the Devill is behind, he intends to bring some of you into some great sin by these; he hath set his net for you, when you are troubled and vexed by such contentions, the Devill sees you fit for a temptation, now I hope I shall get him to do such and such things, which otherwise I could never have got him to. Oh that we had hearts when we find contentions stirring to consider, But is there not a temptation in them?

The seventieth.
Consider how the heart of God is set upon making peace with us, and what it cost him.

God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself: this work hath taken up the thoughts, counsels, heart of God from all eternity above any thing that ever he did: this is the chief master-piece of all the works of God. There is more of the glory of God in this, then in all that God hath done. This is and shall be the object of the admiration of Angels and Saints, the matter of their praises to all eternity. The heart of God was so in this, that he was resolved to have it whatsoever it cost him; it cost the dearest that ever any thing in this world did; yea the price of it was more then ten thousand worlds are worth: it was no lesse then the blood of the Sonne of God, of him who is the second person in Trinity, God blessed for evermore. Col. I. 14. In whom we have redemption through his blood who is the image of the invisible God, the first borne of every creature: by him were all things created, he is before all things: by him all things consist, in him all fulnesse dwells: and having made peace through the blood of his Crosse, ver. 20. What God hath done for peace with us, calls aloud to us to prize peace one with another. It is the Apostles argument. 1 Job. 3. 16. He laid down his life for us, we ought to lay downe our lives for the brethren. It cost his life to make our peace with God. We should be willing to do any thing we are able, even to the hazard of our lives, to make peace among the Saints. Christ laid down his life even for this peace also. Ephes. 2. 14. For he is our peace who hath made both one, and hath broke downe the middle wall of partition betwene us, having abolished in his flesh the enmity, to make in himselfe of twaine one new man, so making peace, and that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the Crosse. Christ reconciles both unto God: but how? it is in one body. Lay this Consideration warm at your hearts, and it will comfort your hearts, and so preferve and encreafe peaceable dispositions in you towards one another.

The eighth.

Consider how unworthy we were when Jesus Christ received us into union with himselfe.

Hat uncomely, what loathsome creatures we were! yet Christ took us into his bosome, into his heart, and resolved that never any thing should seperate us from him againe. But that those embracements of his should be everlasting, and yet shall every trifle take us off from one anothers hearts? shall every jealous spurious conceit, every little difference, be en-ough to seperate us and that almost irreconcileably? Have we the spirit of Christ in us? is the same minde in us that was in Christ Jesus?
The ninth.

Consider that we are called to Peace.

God hath called us to peace, 1 Cor. 7:15. That case upon which the Apostle mentions our calling to peace is as difficult a case to preserve peace in, as any can fall out in one's life. It was the case of man and wife unequally yoked, one is a Beleever, the other an Infidell, yet being man and wife the Apostle determines that the Beleever must be content to live with the unbeleever, as it becomes a wife or a husband; except he or she of themselves will depart, but they should give them no occasion of departing, but rather by their holy humble conversation seek to convert them: this no question was accounted a hard task, but it must be, says the Apostle, and upon this he grounds it, for God hath called us to peace. There is another case almost as difficult as this, where the patience and quietness of spirit is very much tryed, and that is when a servant meets with a harsh, rugged, cruel master, that abuses him very injuriously; if any thing would put ones spirit into a rage, one would thinke this would do it. No, faith the Apostle, such must be the command you must have over your spirits, as you must patiently bear this: and he grounds it upon this, For hereunto were ye called, 1 Pet. 2:21, 22. But though husbands and wives should live at peace, though they suffer one from another: though servants should put up wrongs from their masters, yet it followes not that the like patience should be required in us, when we are wronged by our equals, by those to whom we have no such band of relation to tye us. Yes, this argument of calling is strong in this case also: 1 Pet. 3:8,9. Love as brethren, be courteous, not rendring evill for evill, or railing for railing, but contrariwise, bles-sing, knowing that ye are thereunto called.

The tenth.

Consider the presence of God and of Christ.

Our God, our Father, our Master, our Saviour, stands by looking on us. It is a most excellent passage that I finde in an Epistle of Luther to the Ministers of Norimberg. There were great divisions amongst them: he writes to them that he might pacifie their spirits one towards another. Suppose (says he)
he you saw Jesus Christ standing before you, and by his very eyes speaking thus unto your hearts. What do you, O my dear children, whom I have redeemed with my blood, whom I have begotten again by my Word, to that end that you might love one another? Know that this is the note of my Disciples. Leave this business, ye wholly cast it upon me, I will look to it, there is no danger that the Church should suffer by this, though it should be stilled, yea though it should dye, but there is a great deal of danger if you dissent amongst yourselves, if you bite one another: Do not thus sadden my spirit, do not thus spill the holy Angels of their joy in Heaven; am not I more to you, then all matters that are between you? then all your affections? then all your offences? What? can any words of a brother, can any unjust trouble penetrate your hearts, stick so fast in you as my wounds? as my blind, as all that I am to you, your Saviour Jesus Christ? Oh that we had such real apprehensions of Christ looking upon us, speaking to us!

causim, vel in me rejeicite ego video, nihil periculi est, si quiuecat vel etiam mortuar nihil nocet Ecclesiae, sed hoc erit periculum si dissidentis & mordeantis invicem. Nolite sic contribuere spesium, nolite Angelos sanctos in coe - gaudis iropolieres; an ego non plus sum vobis quam omnes causa, omnes affectus, omnes offenditones? Ite & forius penetrant, & hertverba aliqua fratris, vel iniquae molestiae quam mea vulnera, meus sanguis, quam tectus ipse salvator Jesus Christus? Luther Epist ad Norimbergenfis.

The eleventh.
Consider what account we can give to Jesus Christ of all our Divisions.

When Christ shall come, will you stand before him with scratched faces, with black and blew eyes? 1 Thes.3.12,13. The Lord make you to increase and abound in love one towards another, and towards all men: To what end? To the end, faith the Apostle, he may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his Saints. It will be a sad thing to be found in our divisions, at the coming of Jesus Christ, Mat.24.50. the comming of Christ is mentioned as a terror to those who shall but begin to smite their fellow-servants. We may wrangle & stand out one against another in our contentions now; but it will not be so easie to answer Jesus Christ:
Heart divisions

Christ, as it is to answer one to another. In the Name of Jesus Christ I now speak unto you, yea as from him charge you, let no reason move you to contend with, dissent or separate from your brethren, but that which you are persuaded in your conscience, and that after due and serious examination will hold out before, will be approved of, Jesus Christ at his coming.

The twelfth.

Let every man consider his owne weaknesses.

You are ready to take offence from others, within a while you are as like to be offensive to others. There will be as much need they should bear with you, as now there is you should bear with them. The Common Law of those who intend to live at peace one with another, is: Veniam, petimus, damusque, We desire pardon, and we doe pardon.

The thirteenth.

Let us consider our mortality.

It is but a little time we have to live; shall the greater part of it, nay why should any part of it be ravel'd out with contentions and quarrels? I have read of Pompey, that upon a time passing over divers hills, where there lived many people in caves, but their order was that the man lived in one cave and the wife in another; he asking the reason, they said, In those parts they live not long, therefore they desired that the little time they did live, they might have peace and quiet, which they had found by experience they could not have, if man and wife lived constantly together. Though the means they used for their quiet was fordid, yet the good use they made of the shortness of their lives was commendable. Virgil saies, if swarms of Bees meet in the ayre, they will sometimes fight as it were in a set battell with great violence; but if you cast but a little dust upon them, they will all be presently quiet. Sprinkle upon your hearts the meditations of death, that within a while this flesh of yours will be turned to dust, this will quiet you.
The Evill of our Times.

The fourteenth.
Consider the life of heaven.

There is and will be perfect agreement there. We are here as Bees, flying up and down from flower to flower all day, but at night they come all into the same Hive; That is a place where Luther and Zuinglius will well agree. Shall not we whom God from all eternity hath ordained to live co-heires in heaven, to joyn together in praises there, agree together here on earth?

CHAP. XXXIII.
Joyning graces.

1. Wisdom.

The deepest Seas are the most calme, so men of the deepest judgements are most quiet. A man of understanding is of an excellent Spirit, Prov. 17.27. or thus, is of a coole Spirit, for so the word signifies; his spirit is not heat with passion, there is a coole dew of examination and deliberation upon his spirit, he weighs the circumstances, consequences, and issues of things; he orders and disposes of things so, as jarres, contradictions and oppositions are prevented. The wisdome that is from above is pure, peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, Jam. 3.17. Reason and Wisdome have a majesty in them, and will force reverence. Let Passion reverence the presence of Reason, says Basil, as children doing things unseemly are afraid of the presence of men of worth.

2. Faith.

1. His unites us to Christ and God, and in them to one another.
2. Faith commits all causes, all feares, injures to God.
3. Faith layes hold upon, and improves those gracious promises that God hath made to his Churches for union. Faith fues out the Bond.
4. Faith is able to descry the issue of troubles and afflictions; Though Sense layes, It will not be, Reason, It cannot be, yet Faith gets above, and layes, It shall be, I descry land: and thus quiets all in the soule; all being quiet there, the turbulent motions that are in our spirits one towards another are soon quieted.

O o
3. Humility.

Olof. 3.12. Put on as the elect of God, bowels of mercies, kindnesse, humblenesse of minde. Ephes. 4.2. With all lowliness and meeknesse, and long-suffering, forbearing one another in love, endeavouring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. Phil. 2.3. Let nothing be done through strife or vain-glory, but in lowliness of minde let each esteeme others better then himself. We may say of Humility, as Tertullus, Acts 24. said of Felix, By thee we enjoy great quietness. An humble heart looks upon every truth of God as infinitely above it selfe, therefore it is willing to receive it from any; a child may lead it, Esay 11. 6. One Baldasar, a German Div. ne, writing to Ecolampadius, hath this notable expression: Let the Word of the Lord come, let it come, and we will put under six hundred necks if we had them. Such a disposition as this would make much for peace. Esay 32. 18, 19. we have a promife, that the people of God should dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in quiet resting places, and the City shall be low, in a low place. When the heart lyes lowest, it is quietest.

The joynts in the body cannot joyne, but one part must be hollow, and give way to the other. Condescension of one to another is a principall thing in friendship. Philip. 2. the example of Christ emptying himselfe, and making himselfe to be of no reputation, is let before us as an argument for our union, that therefore we should doe nothing through strife, be like minded, having the same love, and be of one accord, and one minde. It is indifferent to a heart emptied of Selfe, whether it conquers, or be conquered, so Truth may triumph. In other conflicts the Conquerour hath the honour, and the conquered is disgraced; but in the conflicts for truth, both conquered and conquerour are honourable; the mercy is the greater to him that is conquered; but he must have a self-denyng heart to make him think so.
5. Patience.

The Olive, the Embleme of Peace, will continue greene, though overflowne by the waters for a long time together. After Noah had been so long in the Ark, the Dove brought an Olive leafe in her mouth to him. It may be an Emblem of Patience as well as Peace. Patience and Peaceableness are neere akin. Ephes. 4.2.3. Long-suffering is amongst the graces, where the unity of the spirit is to be kept in the bond of peace.

There is a notable story I finde in the lives of the German Divines: One Vitus Theodorus a Divine, sends to advise with Melanthon what he should do when Osiander preached against him; Melanthon writes to him, and beseeches him for the love of God, yea charges him that he should not answer Osiander again, but that he should hold his peace, and behave himself as if he heard nothing. Vitus Theodorus writes back again, This was very hard, yet he would obey. Let not men be too hasty to oppose oppositions, but let them go on patiently in a constant way, resolving to bear what they meet with, and God at length will make their righteousness break forth as the light. Confute evill reports by thy life. He that knowes not to heare calumnies, reproaches, injuries, he knowes not how to live, fayes Chytraus, another German Divine.

Rom. 14.17. The Kingdom of heaven is righteousness, peace; joy in the holy Ghost. This grace in the heart puts a grace upon all a mans conversation; it makes it lovely and amiable. The beames of the Sunne shining upon the fire will put it out; The beames of this spirituall joy will put out the fire of our passions.

7. Meeknesse, Gentleness.

Milk quenches wild-fire, Oyle (fayes Luther) quenches Suavisitas sermo. Lime, which water sets on fire. Opposition will heat will fire men, when meeknesse and gentlenesse will still and quench all. Cicero fayes, Sweetnesse of Speech and carriage is in omni re severitas, abhit; habet illa quidem gravitatem, sed amicitia remisit; or esse debet, & librior, dulcior, & ad omnum comitatem facilitatem; proclivior. Cicer, de Amicit. O.0.2 that that which seasons friendship; severity in everything and sadness must not be among friends in their converse; such a kind of carriage may have a seeming gravity, but friendship must have a remissness; it must be more free and sweet, disposed to all mildness and easiness. Ephes. 4:2,3. Meekness comes in as a special grace for peace and unity, so Col. 3:12.

8. Love.

That is the special uniting grace; Faith indeed hath the preeminence in our union with Christ our head, but Love is the grace that unites the members. 1 Cor. 13. the Apostle shews many of the fruits of this grace, all tending to union and peace; It suffereth long, it envieth not, it is not puffed up, it behaveth not it selfe unseemly, it seeketh not her owne, it is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Bearing all things and enduring all things seem to be the same. Therefore some would have it, it covereth all things, for so the word also signifieth; but there is a greater elegance in it, in the Translation, beareth all things, it is like the crosse maine beam in a house, supporting the whole building: and were it not for some who have the love of God and his truth, and the good of the publique, enabling them to undergo what they do, more then any encouragement from men, all things in Church and State would be ready to fall into confusion, to be nothing but a heap of rubbish; but this love enables to beare all things. But if they have no encouragement, but see that though they hazard themselves never so much, be of never so great use, do the greatest services that can be expected from men, yet when mens turns are served, they are little regarded, but envied and narrowly watched, to spy out any thing that may have some shew of expecting against them, and left to shift for themselves as well as they can, when they might justly expect a great reward of their services, yet are disappointed, their hearts are grieved. But yet because they are acted by a principle of love to God, his cause, the publique, they therefore still hold out, go on in their way, labour to be as instrumentall as they can for good, commit themselves and all their endeavours to God, expecting encouragement from him, and so they endure all things: such men are worth their weight in

in gold: here is a heart that hath much of the spirit of God in it, God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him. No marvell though these men act so swiftly in their way; no marvell though their motion in publick service be so speedy, for their Charret is like that Charret of Salomons, Cant. 3.

10. The middle thereof is paved with love, and this is for the daughters of Jerusalem. Now the love of God be for ever with these his servants, the blessing of the Almighty and all his Saints, be with them, upon them, in them and theirs for ever.

Where men are acted by love they may do any thing without offence. If you be silent and be silent out of love; if you cry out, and you do it out of love; if you spare, and it be out of love; if you correct, and you correct from love; let all be for amendment for good, all from the root of love; love, and do what you will. Thus Augustine in his 7. Tractate upon John.

These with other uniting graces that might be mentioned; are the graces that God expects should be in a special manner acted in these times; and this is in a holy manner ηαι δε παντες, to serve the time, as some Copies have it, Rom.12.11. This is the most suitable work for the times wherein we live. What is more seasonable for divided times then uniting graces? And that union that comes from the acting of these graces, is a spirituall, holy, truly Christian union, a raised union to a farre higher pitch then any naturall excellencies can raise unto. It is an excellent saying of Clemens Alexandrinus, If the spirituall man be in us, our humanity is fraternity. What then is our fraternity? it is raised to that whith hath no name to express it: the union of the Saints in heaven is beyond the unity of fraternity; this which is of grace is of the same nature.

CHAP. XXXIV.

joyning Practices.
The first the practice of the tongue.
Gentle Language.

A Soft answer turneth away wrath, Prov.15.1. In your disputes let your arguments be as hard as you will, but let your words be soft. Soft words & hard arguments make a good dispuite, dispute. Gentle language gains much upon the hearts of men, 1 Chron.28.2.

Heare me my brethren, and my people, sayes David. This was better and tended more to union between King and people, then the rugged churlish answer of Rehoboam: My Father made your joke heavy, and I will add to your poake. But what came on it? Ten tribes were rent from him. As good a man as he could say, Heare me my brethren and my people. Good words are as cheap as bad. Gentle courteous language is as easie as rough and bitter. Napthali is said to give goodly words, sayings of goodlinesse or fairenesse; so the Hebrew hath it, that is, faire, pleasing words: this Tribe were faire spoken men. Now compare this with Deut. 33.23. there Napthali is said, to be satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord. Faire, courteous language hath an acceptance among men, and the blessing of God is with it.

The second joyning Practice.

Let us humble our selves for our divisions.

That is a rule, Whatsoever sinne you have been guilty of, though you have for the time life it, yet if you have not been humbled for it, a hundred to one but you fall into it againe. Yes, say some, it is fit we should humble our selves for our divisions, we will have dayes of fafts, that we may do it. But take this note with you, In your dayes of fast, or at other times when you would thus humble your selves, let it be principally for your owne guiltinesse herein. Many in their humiliations make great complaints of others, as the cause of divisions, whom it may be God will own, and acquit; take heed of being too forward in medling with others in your faists, lest your faists prove like those, Isay 58.4. Ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist.

The third joyning Practice.

An Amnestia.

We see there hath been mistakes and differences thorough humane frailty, and a willingnesse to be otherwise so far as God gives light, let all former unkindnesses be forgotten, so as never to rip up old things to charge them one upon another: let there be a line of forgetfulness drawn over them, them; let them be buried in oblivion. This was the Athenians Amnestia; a Law that was made by Thrasybulus, with the consent of the people, that former injuries should be forgotten. It was made upon this occasion. After Lysander had conquered the Athenians, he set thirty Governours over them which tyrannized exceedingly. Thrasybulus, with many others, were banished; but after a while, Thrasybulus gathering together his banished Countreymen, he got up an Army, and by it delivered the Athenians from the yoke of these thirty Tyrants: now because when the banished men came home to their former possessions, Thrasybulus feared there would be exceeding heart-burning amongst the Athenians, that those who had been banished would be revenged upon those whom they judged the causes of it, and the other would be enraged against them: therefore Thrasybulus got the people to joyn with him in this Law, which they called Amnestia, that all former wrongs should be forgotten, & that they should live lovingly and peaceably henceforth one with another, as if such breaches had never been amongst them. Whenever God shall deliver these Kingdoms from bondage, and settle things amongst us, the addition of such a Law which we may call our English Amnestia will be very necessary. Otherwise oh the abundance of the fire of malice that will remaine raked up under the ashes, ready upon any occasion to burst out! one will look upon the other with eyes full of revenge, with scorn, hatred, and disdain; one will charge the other as the cause of all our miseries, and curse him; the other will charge him, and curse him as deeply. Every time men think what they have suffered, their hearts will be enraged. Such now is that extreme bitter exasperation, and deadly rage of mens hearts one against another, that whenever peace shall be concluded, if it be not made exceeding sure, our pacification is like to be the foundation of far greater evills to us then yet have besalne us. If this Amnestia be not strengthened with what is in the widsome, power of man to do, and the blessing of the almighty also with it, we are an undoue people.
The fourth joyning Practice.
Never contend but be sure you understand one another what it is you contend for.

I have read of a quarrell there was between the Eastern and Westerne Churches; the Eastern Churches said there were three subsistences in the Trinity, but not three persons; the Western said there were three Persons, but not three subsistences. Athanasius comes and reconciles them both. It is true, the contentions among us are more then verball, yet for any thing a great part of the Kindome knowes (even of those whose spirits are bitter enough) they may be no other then meerly verball. How many ignorant people, women, young ones, understand not where the difference lyes between Presbyterians and those whom they call Independents; and yet they can with much bitterness cry out against the one or the other. Perhaps you have some Ministers, or others, come to your Table, they tell you a tale of such and such, your heart is hot presently, but do you understand the matter? You begin to make a stirre, but can you give account of it? Be silent, forbear, take heed what you do; meddle not in way of strife, till you understand where the controversy lyes, and that from both parties.

The fifth joyning Practice.
Be ingenious; 1. do not lye at the catch to take advantages;
2. make the best interpretation of things you can.

If God should catch advantages against us, what would become of us? This is most unseemly, when men are seeking to finde out truth, if then they shall piddle about words, catch at phrases, get hold of expressions, and seek to make their advantages out of them; and in this shall be the greatest strength of their answer, though this may have a specious shew before men, who are willing to receive any thing which makes against what they would have crushed, yet this will not abide before the throne of Christ. We reade Matth. 4. Christ had a great dispute with the Devill, in which he had him at great advantage in his quotation of a Scripture, ver. 6. He shall give his Angells charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall beare thee up, lest at any any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. This was quoted out of the 91. Psalm, there it is, He shall give his Angels charge over thee to keep thee in all thy ways. Yet Christ did not catch this advantage, he did not so much as upbraid him for leaving out that passage, which he might justly have done, but he answers to the thing. Yea Christ might have taken a further advantage against the Devil, for the words following in the Psalm are a prophesie of Christ destroying the power of the Devil, Thou shalt tread upon the Lyon and Adder, the young Lyon and the Dragon shalt thou trample under thy feet. Christ did not take the advantage of this neither, and upbraid him with it, he had enough against him in the thing it selfe he brought. It is a signe that men have lesse advantage in the matter, when they seek too much to catch at all the advantages they can in the manner of the expressions of those whom they oppose.

2. Make the best interpretation of things you can. 1 Cor. 13.5. Love thinkes no evil. It may be if you meet with a man in the streets, if he stays not to talk with you, if he takes not speciall notice of you, you presently think it is his pride, his fleighting, disregarding you, this is the worst interpretation that can be. Why? is it not possible that it may be thorough multitude of business in his head that you know not of? May it not be that his eyes and thoughts were another way? he did not take notice of your passing by him; is it not thus often with your selfe in respect of others? Againe, perhaps such a man you find not in his behaviour towards you when you are with him, looking so smilingly upon you, carrying himselfe in that familiar affable way as you expected; you presently think and say, Surely it is his pride and surlingesse, whereas it may be it is because his head is fuller then yours, which may afterwards be for your good, if you would be but patient a while; it may be it is from some trouble of his spirit at that time; it may be it is from the temper of his body, his constitution, or some weaknesse in it at that time; if such a faire interpretation may be made, why should not an ingenuous candid spirit make it? This very exception I find was taken against Basilus Magnus, and Nazianzen in one of his Orations, in which he highly commends Basil, answers it, and justifies him; It is hard to keep unity, love and peace with men who are of exceptious carping dispositions; if God were were strict to mark what we doe amisse, what would become of us? God is strict to mark what good there is in his Saints; if there be any little good in the midst of much imperfection, Gods way is to passe by the imperfection, and take notice of the good; but our way is often, if there be a little bad, though but through a very pardonable mistake, in the midst of much good, to passe by all the good, and to seize upon the mistake, to make it the seed of contention, to brood over it, and so beget the brats of contention from it. Certainly this ought not thus to be.

The sixt joyning Practice:
So farre as Reason and Conscience will give way, yeeld to those whom you contend withall.

That standing at a distance with those that dissent from us, even to the utmost, is the way of many; but certainly it is a false way, God is not in it. It may be some, yea many will judge this yeelding to be a faire, handsome turning about to the other side; take heed of such bold cenfures: Is every difference from that rigid, stout spirit of thine, a warping from the truth, a sinfull temporizing for private ends? The Lord judge between you and his servants. Some men who have been of yeelding spirits in things that God would have them, have stood out undauntedly when God hath called them to witnesse to his truth, when those who have been stout and harsh in their owne wayes have basely betrayed it, when they have beene tried with greater sufferings. Ambrose was a man of a sweet and moderate spirit, witnesse amongst other things that notable saying of his, If that end of vertues be the greatest that looks at publique good, Moderation is of all the most beautifull. Ay, but I warrant you, Ambrose was a man who saw which way the times went, he was loth to hazard himself in standing out against men who had power in their handes, this temper of his made him thus plead for moderation. No, Ambrose was a man of an invincible spirit in the wayes of God; In all Ecclesiasticall Story we read not of a braver spirit then his contesting with men of power in the cause of Christ. For when Theodotus the Emperor had been the cause of a great slaughter in Thessalonica, though provoked to it by a sedition there, the Emperor a while after comming to Milan, where Ambroses charge was, after the usual usuall manner he came to the Church, Ambrose meets him, and forbids him entrance, reproving him before all the people, Does you not know, oh Emperor, (fayes he) the barbarousnesse of that vile fart of yours? or doe you not remember we have another Emperor above you? what bold impiety is this? doe you not feare to bring those feet of yours, polluted with the blood of innocents, into this holy place? or to stretch forth those hands of yours, wet, yea dropping with blood, to take the most holy body of the Lord? or to put that mouth of yours, which (forgetting not only the clemency which belongs to an Emperor, but the justice) gave out the sentence for the killing so many innocent men, to the precious blood of the Lord? Away therefore, will you add impiety to your sinne? doe not think much to come under that discipline which the Lord commands. Upon this the Emperor goes back to his Palace with sighing and teares, and spent eight moneths in mourning and lamentation, and yet after this he was not received by Ambrose, till againe being sharply reprehended, he cast himelfe downe in the porch, upon the pavement, bewailing his sinne, and rising up he was about to fit in the Chancel where the Emperorous feate was, he was required to goe forth into the place of penitents. With the like, yea more boldnesse he dealt with Raffinus, a great Courtier, the Master of the Emperours Horse. Here behold a man of a moderate, quiet spirit, yeeldable in what he could, yet when he conceived himselfe interested in the Cause of Christ, his courage raises him above the feares or favours of men.

The seventh joyning practice:
If you will needs be striving, strive who shall doe one another most good, who shall engage one another in the most and greatest offices of love.

This is a good combate; such striving as this is, God and his blessed Angels looke upon, and take much delight in.

I find a notable story in the life of Alexander the Great, which may put on and encourage Christians in such a combat as this: There was a great King in India, his name was Taxiles, who on a time came to salute Alexander, and said unto him, What should we need to fight and make Wars one with another, if thou commest not to take away our water and our necessary commodity to live by, der.
for which things men of judgement must needs fight? as for other goods, if I be richer then thee, I am ready to give thee of mine; and if I have lesse, I will not think scorn to thanking thee, if thou wilt give me some of thine. Alexander being pleased to hear him speak thus wifely, embraced him, and said unto him, Thinkest thou that this meeting of ours can be without fight, for all these godly fair words? No, no, thou hast won nothing by them, for I will fight and contend with thee in honesty and curtesie; because thou shalt not exceed me in bounty and liberality. So Alexander took divers gifts of him, but gave more to him.

Oh that our contentions were turned into such contentions as these are! Let us rejoice in any opportunity of doing any office of love to those we differ from, yea to those who have wronged us. It was wont to be said of Arch-Bishop Cranmer, If you would be sure to have Cranmer doe you a good turne, you must doe him some ill one; for though he loved to doe good to all, yet especially he would watch for opportunities to doe good to such as had wronged him. Had we but a few leading men of such spirits among us, how great a blessing of peace might we enjoy!

_The eighth joyning Practice._

Let every man be diligent in that work that God calls him to.

_Sundry to be quiet, and to doe your owne businesse, and to worke with your owne hands, as we commanded you, 1 Thess. 4.11. It is not an arbitrary thing, the command of God lyes upon it._

I am verily persuwaded that many of our divisions in opinion and otherwise, our hard thoughts one of another, are raised and fomented by such as want imployment. Hence they go about from place to place, arguing, disputing, jangling about things they understand not; and yet think themselves to have a deeper insight then ordinary. I would be loath to add to the affliction of those, who by the rage of the enemy have been put out of their imployments, and are come for shelter amongst us; God forbid that I should willingly grieve them, their case is to be pitied, we are to succour, comfort, and helpe them what we can; but yet I desire them withall to take heed of a temptation they may be under, and think not of it, in this their want of imployment, now they are here they meet with variety of company, with all sorts of people, and having too much much time to spare, the Devill may soon and unawares to them prevail to cause an itching desire in them; after this opinion and the other, this and the other way, which having taken their hearts, they carry up and down what they heare, and what apprehensions they have of things, and persons, pleading and arguing for that they have but slight and sudden apprehensions of, and by arguing, the thing gets down into their spirits, before it be thoroughly examined and understood, and being got down there, then it must needs be maintained, and so a spirit of contention rises in them, and seeds of contention are sowne among others. It may be some of your callings are low and mean, and that may possibly be your discouragement: but let it not be so, for there may be as much obedience to God in thy faithfulness in that mean calling of thine as in the highest and most honourable employment upon earth, yea thy reward may be as great, for God looks at faithfulness in the work, not the greatness of the work. Let every man know, says Luther, that his work in any godly kind of life is a divine work, because it is the work of a divine call, having God's command for it.

The ninth.

In all strivings with men have a care that due respect to their persons be kept as much as may be.

It is very observable, when God in the manifestation of his displeasure against the Devill, in the Serpent, cursed him, then he says cursed be thou; but when he would manifest it against Simeon and Levi, it is not, Cursed be ye, or Cursed be they; but Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce, and their rage, for it was cruel. You may be bitter against mens sinne, so be it you shew due respect to their persons; by denying that respect you might and ought to give to mens persons, you deprive your self of that liberty which otherwise you might take in opposing their sinne, which is the thing you say you ayme only at.

The tenth.

Labour to get good by the wrongs that are done us.

If we found God blessing them to us for good, our hearts will be very moderate towards those that have done them. The over-ruling providence of God turning the wrong that Josephs brethren had done him so much good, took off Joseph's spirit from practising any evil against them; but when this good shall come to us by the exercise of our own graces, it will be more prevalent to quiet and moderate our spirits. Philip of Macedon thanked some great men of Athens who had brought up ill reports of him, because both in speech and life he was the better labouring by words and deeds to prove them liars: the best answer to ill reports, is to live contrary to them.

The eleventh.

Turne your zeale from working one against another to zeale for God.

You will say, Are workes of zeale any helps to peace and union? who are they that make the greatest disturbances in the world, but your fiery zelots? if men were of a cooler temper, we should have more peace.

Ans. Distentempered zeale may cause disturbance; but true zeale, the cleare flame of the Spirit of God, making men in their waies zealous not for themselves, but for God, this has the blessing of Gods peace with it. Numb. 25. 12. 13. Phinehas there has the promise of the Covenant of peace, because he was zealous for his God.

The twelfth.

In seeking to reduce others to good, let it appeare that you seek rather to be helpfull to them, then to get victorie over them.

It is grievous to a mans nature to be conquered, but not to be helped. Ambrose writing to his friend Marcellus about composing some breaches between him and his brother and sister, hath amongst other this excellent expression; I thought that to be the best way, I would have none to be conquered, and all to overcome. The like practice is reported of Scipio, when at the taking of New Carthage two Souldiers contended about the Murall Crowne, due to him who first climbed the walls, so that the whole Army was thereupon in danger of division, when he came to Scipio, he decides the matter thus: He told them they both got up the wall together, and so gave the scaling Crowne to both.
The thirteenth.

Make up breaches as soon as may be.

Take them, if it may be, at the beginning. When good men fall out, only one of them is usually faulty at the first, but if such strifes continue any time, both of them become guilty. If you deferre the setting of a bone broken, it cannot be done without much difficulty, and great paine. Prov. 17.14. The beginning of strife is as when one lets out water, therefore leave off contention before it be medled with; antequam immiscatur, so you may reade it, before it be got into thee, and mingle it selfe in thy heart, or between you and your brother. If your house be on fire, you doe not stay quenching it till it breaks out of the rooife; divisions that are but sparks, very little at the first, if let alone, grow very high and great in a little time. I have read a story of two sonnes of the Duke of Florence, who having been hunting, the one said, My dog killed the Hare, and the other said, Nay but my dog killed it: words multiplied, they grew into a heat, the one drawes upon the other, and kills him; the servant seeing his master killed, draws upon him who had slaine him, and kills him. Neglect not beginnings of quarrels, you know not to what they may grow.

The fourteenth.

Let us account those brethren, in whom we see godliness, and carry our selves towards them accordingly, though they will not account us.

Let us not be too ready to take the forfeiture of our brethren. Ipsum fratris, uscumque Donatistis fratres, sunt euntur orthodoxis erga fustas necessarium.
Lastly, pray much.

Pliny says of the pearls they call Unions, though they be engendered in the sea, yet they participate more of the heavens than the sea. Certainly this precious union, though it be amongst men yet it hath its lustre and beauty, yea its very being from the heavens. You must look up to heaven therefore for peace, for the preservation, increase, lustre, beauty of it; if you would have it.

Job 25. 2. God maketh peace in his high places, the Lord can make peace between high and low. Let us carry mens rugged, crooked, perverse hearts to God in Prayer, who is the great joyner of hearts; it is he that makes men to be of one mind in a house, he maketh the wars to cease. Psal. 122. 6. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem. In your prayers for the Church this must be mentioned as a special blessing. If praying prevale not, fighting will not. Those are the most peaceable men in Church and Common-wealth, that pray most for the peace of them; God hath more prayers for the peace of this Church and State upon the file, of theirs whom some of you account hinderers of it, then of yours. You complain much for want of peace, you inveigh much against those whom you are pleased to mark out as hinderers of the peace, but doe you pray as much? You have these means presented unto you for the furtherance of peace; what other you may meet with any way, make use of. 2 Thes. 3. 16. The Lord of peace give you peace alwayes by all means.

And that all may be the better improved, let the exhortation of the Apostle, 1 Thes. 4. 11. sink into you; Study to be quiet, the words are, Love the honour of being quiet: There is great excellency in it.

That is the last thing.

Cap. XXXV.

Exhortation to peaceable and brotherly union, shewing the excellency of it.

And now, my brethren, as the Eunuch said to Philip concerning his Baptism, Here is water, what lets but I may be baptized? I shall say concerning our uniting in peace and love one one with another. Here are joyning Principles, joyning Considerations, joyning Graces, joyning Practices; what now lets, but that we may joyne in love and peace one with another? Surely nothing can, let but extreme corrupt, perverse hearts of our owne.

The Apostle Paul is mighty earnest in his desires, in his exhortations for this: 1 Cor. 1.12. Now I beseech you brethren by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you, but that ye be perfectly joyned together, in the same mind, and in the same judgement. The word translated perfectly joyned, signifies such a joyning, as when a bone is out of joynt, is perfectly set right again.

So Philip. 2.1. If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, fulfill ye my joy, that ye be like minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind, let nothing be done through strife, &c. The Apostle pours forth his soule in this exhortation, it is a heart-breaking exhortation.

Luther, though a man of a stirring, hot spirit, yet writing to the Pastors of the Church of Strasburg, hath these words: I Pray you be perswaded, that I shall always be as desirous to embrace concord, as I am desirous to have the Lord Jesus to be propitious to plethi concordiam, quam cupiditate velim mibi Dominum ftum propitium. Luther Ecclesia, Agent inuisit pafloribus.

I finde also in a Letter that Martin Bucer writes to a godly Minister, a very high expression, of that high esteeume he had of, and earnest desires after the curing of divisions: Who would not fempore.

Luther Ecclesia, Agent inuisit pafloribus.

Layes he) purchase with his life the removing that infinite scandal that comes by dissention? Oh that there were such hearts in us! Christ expects it from us all, but especially from his Ministers, for they are his Ambassadors for peace, to beseech men in his stead to be reconciled to God: reconciliation with God will reconcile us one to another. If God so loved us, we ought also to love one another, 1 John 4.11. The faces of the Cherubins in the Temple, looked on towards another, which some think signified the agreement that should be amongst Ministers of the Gospel. So the six branches in the Candelesticke joyned all in one; those who hold the light of truth before others, should be united in peace in one, amongst themselves. The first thing Chrifts Ministers were to doe when they came to any place was was to say Peace be to that place; if any sons of peace were there, they were to abide, otherwise not: Surely then it is expected that themselves should be sons of peace. The contentions of private Christians are offensive, but the contentions of Ministers is a scandal with a witness. Yet in all Ages of the Church, the corrupt Clergie have been the greatest causes of divisions; they have been of the most cruel spirits against any that differed from them. But let not such a spirit be in us; we have enough to do to contend with the wicked of the world, with the malice of Satan, let us not contend one with another.

Luther writing to the Ministers of Norimberg, brings in Christ saying to them, Satis est vobis ob nomen meum malorum, You are like to suffer evil enough for my name, you need not be afflictions one to another. It was barbarousnesse in the Priests of Baal to cut and slash themselves, but it is worse for the Ministers of Jesus Christ to cut and slash one another. 1 Kings 6.23. The Cherubims were made of the Olive tree; If you be typified by them, as we hinted before, let it appeare that you are olives, not brambles: yea and v. 31. For the entring of the Oricle the doors were of Olive-tree: who will believe that you bring the Oracles of God with you, when they see by your froward, contentious carriage, that you never entred in at these doors? People cannot but think it a miserable thing to have a scratching, tearing bramble to be over them. Oh that God would set the beauty, glory of peace, friendship, love, before us! That this precious pearle, Union, might be highly valued by us! All men are taken in some degree or other with the excellency and sweetnes of love and friendship. Some men, sayes Cicero, despise riches, others honours; those things that by some are delighted in, by others are vilified; but all men of all sorts have a high esteem of friendship, they think there can be no life without it.

Gen. 34.21. The great commendation that Hamor and Shechem give of Jacob and his Sons as an argument to perfwade the men of Shechem to joyn with them in the giving their daughters to them for wives, and in taking theirs, is, These men are peaceable with us. A peaceable disposition is very convincing.

Multi divitias despiciunt, qua- parvo conten- tas, veniis vidius cultusque del- las, honores ve- ro quorum cupid- itate guidam inflamentur, quan multa ina- consentium ut nobilinantis esse vellevimus existimamus, item easter que quibusdam admirabilis videntur, permulti sime qui nobilem putamus de amicitia omnes ad unum idem se remote, sint amicitia vitam esse nullam sentias. Cicer, de Amicicit.

Cant. 6. 6. My dove, my undefiled is but one, she is the only one of her mother, she is the choice one of her that bare her. What then followes? The daughters saw her and blessed her, yea the Queenes, and the Concubines, and they praised her, Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, faire as the moone, clear as the Sunne, terrible as an Army of Banners? Let the Saints be but one, and then they will appeare beautifull and glorious indeed, yea they will be terrible as an army of Baners.

Cyrill of Alexandria, written to John of Antioch, upon the occasion of a Pacifactory Epistle of John unto him, his spirit was so taken with it that it breaks forth thus: Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad, the mid wall of rancour is battered downe, the boiling choler which bereaved the mindes of quietnesse, is purged from among us, and all the occasion of discord and dissention is banished away, for our Saviour Jesus Christ hath granted peace unto the Churches under heaven.

The Thebans made Harmonia a goddesse, they accounted her the defender and patronesse of their City. Harmonious, peaceable, uniting dispositions, have much of God in them; if not from sanctifying grace, yet it is from a common work of the Spirit of God: there is a noblenesse in such a heart. By the Lawes of England Noblemen have this priviledge, that none of them can be bound to the peace, because it is supposed that a Noble disposition will never be engaged in brawles and contentions, it is supposed that the peace is always bound to him, that of his own accord he will be careful to preserve it. It is the bafe Bramble that rends and tears. Nazianzen reports of Alexander, who having taken a City, and consulting what to doe, one Parmenius anfwered, If he were King he would raze the City to the ground. Alexander answers, So would I too, if I were what you are; rigour may become you, but gentlenesse becomes me. Gentlenesse, mercy, goodnesse, love, tendernesse of others sufferings, are the greatst ornaments to a noble spirit. If this be sanctified, the glory of God shines bright indeed in such a heart. For God glories in this, to be the God of peace and love.

1 Thess. 5. 23. The very God of peace. 2 Thess. 3. 16. The Lord of peace himselfe. Jesus Christ in being the Prince of peace, the holy Ghost in being like a Dove that hath no gall: the Gospel is the Gospel of peace; the Kingdom of God is peace as well as righteousness; the legacy that Christ left is a legacy of peace; the Apostolical benediction is grace, mercy, and peace: the glory of the Church is in this, that it is a City compact at unity within it selfe. Yea this will be the glory of that glorious Church, that God is raising a new Jerusalem, there shall be no more crying there, Apoc. 21. 4. Ezech. 14. 9. The Lord shall be King over all the earth, in that day there shall be one Lord, and his name shall be one. There is but one Lord now, but he is called by different names, but in that day his name shall be but one. Zeph. 3. 9.

Then will I turne to a people of pure language, that they may call upon the name of the Lord, and serve him with one consent. The Hebrew word is with one shoulder, now we shoulder one another, but then all shall serve the Lord with one shoulder. This love and peace is compared to the most delightfull, and the most profitable things; Behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell at unity; it is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ranne downe upon the beard, even Aarons beard; that went downe to the skirts of his garment, as the dew of Hermon, that descended upon the mountains of Sion. Psalm 123.

There are many promises made to this. Mat. 5. Blessed are the peace-makers. 2 Cor. 13. 11. Be of one minde, live in peace, and the God of peace shall be with you. John 15. 12. Christ saith, This is his commandement, that we love one another. Ver. 14. he saith, Ye are my friends if ye doe whatsoever I command you. By loving others we doe not only get them to be our friends, but Christ too. Me thinks I see Christ here pleading for love, as one who had to deale with two men who were at some variance, persuadling them to peace and love; Come, you shall passe by all former things, you shall be made friends, by this you shall gaine me also to be a friend to you as long as I live.

Genes. 13. Ver. 8. to the end, is a remarkable Scripture to shew how God is with a loving, gentle, peaceable disposition. Ver. 8. 9. we have Abrahams kinde gentle yeelding to Lot his inferior for peace sake; but mark what followes, and you shall finde he lost nothing by this his yeelding: for as soone as Lot was gone from him, the Lord came to him, ver. 14. and said to him, Lift up now thine eyes and looke from the place where thou art, Northward, Southward, Eastward and Westward, for all.

all the Land that thou seest to thee will I give it; and to thy seed for ever: arise, walk thorough the Land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it, for I will give it unto thee. The difference of what Jacob sayes of Reuben when he was to dye, Gen. 49.4. from that of Moses, Deut. 33.6. is observabile: Jacob sayes, Hee is the first borne, the beginning of his strength; but he shall not excell, because he went to his fathers bed. But Moses, Let Reuben live and not dye, and let not his men be few. The reason of this difference is given by some, because it was fit that Jacob, to deter his other children, should exercise the authority of a father; but Moses frees him from the curse, because he was always loving to his brother Joseph. Brotherly love hath a blessing going along with it: God loves it exceedingely, for it makes much for the glory of God. And to what purpose do we live, if God have not glory by us? Rom. 15.5, 6, 7. the Apostle first prayes that the God of patience and consolation would grant them to be like minded one towards another, according to Christ Jesus, that they may with one minde and one mouth glorifie God. Then he exhorts: Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us to the glory of God. Much of Gods glory depends upon our union. Yea God stands so much upon this, that he is willing to stay for his service till we be at peace one with another. Mat. 5. 23, 24. Leave thy gift before the Altar, and first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. My worship shall stay till you be reconciled. I love my worship, and desire it much, but I must have peace and love amongst your selves first, I will say for that. But I beleech you let us not make God stay too long. Remember while you are wrangling and quarrelling, God stayes on you all this while. If children should be quarrelling, and one comes to them, and sayes, Your father stayes for you, it is time for them to break off. Be not unmannerly with God, in making him stay so long upon you. Some of you have made him wait upon you for an acceptable duty of worship divers weeks, yea it may be many moneths, and yet your spirits are not in temper to offer any sacrifice to God. What a fearfull evill is it then to stand out in a stubborne, sullen, dogged manner refusing to be reconciled! Learned Drusius cites Hebrew Writers, saying, That he that offends his brother ought to seek to pacifie him; if he refuse to be pacified, then he must bring three of his friends with him to intercede twice or thrice, and if he shall after this refuse, then he is to leave him, and such a man quia implacabilis est, vocatur peccator, is called a sinner, with a special note upon him.

Lastly, the Saints enjoyment of the sweetnesse of love, peace and unity among themselves, what is it but heaven upon earth? Heaven is above all storms, tempests, troubles, the happiness of it is perfect rest. We pray that the will of God might bee done on earth as it is done in heaven; why may not we have a heaven upon earth? this would sweeten all our comforts, yea all our afflictions. But the Devil envies us this happiness. Come Lord Jesus, come quickly.

If you would have the excellency of love set before you more fully, reade over and over again the Epistles of John. Ecclesiasticall story reports of this blessed Apostle, whose heart was so full of love, that when he grew very old, not able to preach, yet he would be brought into the congregation in a chaire, and there say only these words, Little children flee idolatry, love one another. But the more excellent union and peace is, the more is the pitty that it should be abused to be serviceable to mens lufts; the more would our misery be if we should be abused in our treaties about it; if we should have a mock-peace; if we should be gulled in either offers of or conclusions about peace; if peace should be made our ruine, but a preparation of us for slaughter. It hath been by many observed, that what the English gained of the French in battell by valour, the French regained of the English by cunning Treaties. The Lord deliver us from such French tricks. Let us all be for peace, yet so as not to befooled into bondage by the name of peace. Now God hath by his mighty arme helped us, let us not be put off with a bable, and made to beleive it is this Pearle. We know with whom we have to deale.

And now as the Apostle, 2 Thes. 3:5. The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God: Let me adde, And into the love of one another. Let us all study peace, seek peace, follow peace, pursue peace, and the God of peace be with us.
